The Shape of Things

BY OVERRIDING THE PRESIDENT'S VETO OF the Wartime Labor Disputes Bill, Congress has not only made a reckless attack on labor morale but, at the same time, has encouraged the unions to abandon their anti-strike pledge by providing a procedure which positively encourages the use of the strike weapon. And in the same week it contributed to labor unrest by turning down subsidy proposals which offer the last hope of holding the line on prices. It is hardly surprising that G. F. Hughes, the well-known contributor to the financial section of the New York Times, should have wondered out loud whether enemy agents were feeding "loco weed" to Congressmen. The only other explanation would seem to be that the "loyal opposition" of office-hungry Republicans and Roosevelt-hating Democrats is deliberately creating confusion which it hopes the electors will blame on the Administration. This may be smart politics but it certainly is a hell of a way to run a war. In its anxiety to assert itself, no matter what the cost, Congress paid no attention whatever to the terms of the President's veto message on the anti-strike bill. Yet it was couched in moderate terms and expressed approval of those clauses which authorized the government to take over war-plants threatened with labor disputes and to impose sanctions against strikes in such plants. But Mr. Roosevelt struck hard at section eight of the bill, which, as he said, "ignores completely labor's 'no-strike' pledge and provides in effect for strike notices and strike ballots." In spite of the passage of the bill Philip Murray of the C. I. O. and William Green of the A. F. of L. have loyally renewed this pledge but, as rising prices undermine existing wage rates, there is going to be strong pressure inside the unions for resort to the strike machinery which Congress has authorized.

SOME PROPONENTS OF THE BILL DECLARE that its main object was to "get" John L. Lewis but we find it hard to think of a set-up more convenient for the miners' leader. He has ordered his men back to work for another armistice period and we have no doubt will be able to prove his innocence if the return to the pits proceeds more slowly than the urgent demand for production requires. Meanwhile, the coal-owners are denouncing an alleged agreement between the Administration and the U. M. W. for continued government operation of the mines. Apart from an ambiguous statement by Lewis no evidence of such an agreement exists, but the new Labor Disputes Act will make it difficult for the government to relinquish its hold. If it does, all Lewis has to do is give thirty days' notice and arrange with the National Labor Relations Board to supervise a strike ballot. There can be little doubt that the members of the U. M. W. would vote for a walk-out and then the only way of preventing a perfectly legal stoppage of production would be for the government to seize the mines once more. We are not much impressed by Mr. Roosevelt's alternative proposal for drafting strikers but it is, at least, more realistic than the Congressional method of curbing strikes.

THE FARM BLOC, REPUBLICANS, AND OTHER groups with economic or political motives for upsetting existing price-control regulations continued to go to town last week with predictions of a severe food shortage if prevailing OPA practices were not reversed. As the conservative Barron's points out, "inflation is now being pushed by a powerful coalition in Congress as a solution" for the food shortage. Unfortunately for the prophets of despair, the latest official report on crop conditions throughout the country indicates a marked improvement in food prospects. Warm, dry weather in the chief growing regions has greatly improved the chances for both wheat and corn, and the hay harvest, now well begun, has been excellent in many parts of the country. Despite newspaper reports to the effect that farmers were being forced by OPA policies to dump their cattle on the market because of a feed shortage, authentic estimates by the livestock industry point to a surplus of more than 15,000,000 head of cattle by next January—the largest in the country's history. The slaughter of one-half of this surplus is estimated to be enough to supply a normal amount of beef for a year to 200,000,000 persons. Hog supplies are similarly high, and pork production is considerably above last year's level. Undoubtedly, the farmers of the country face difficult days in trying to harvest their crops with an inadequate supply of skilled labor, but nothing in the situation justifies the scare headlines in the opposition press, and certainly nothing justifies opening the gates to the final disaster of inflation.

MIDSUMMER IS PAST BUT THE EASTERN FRONT remains stagnant. Has the threat of a second front in the west or south forced Hitler to abandon plans for a new attempt to knock out Russia? Certainly the news points in that direction but if, in fact, Germany has definitely turned to a defensive strategy the need for a new initiative by the United Nations becomes imperative. For Germany could still win victory by means of a defensive policy if that encouraged the United Nations to slacken their efforts, to refuse to take risks, to wait for a collapse of enemy morale. We cannot be certain that our side is completely immune to war-weariness and, indeed, the recent American news may have suggested to German strategists that, given time, the arsenal of democracy might blow up with exasperation. It is not surprising, then, that Moscow should again be raising the question of a second front and pointing out the dangers of delay. It is hard to believe that the Soviet government has not been fully informed of Anglo-American plans. So this prodding suggests that no definite time has yet been fixed for the beginning of those "amphibious operations of great complexity" of which Winston Churchill spoke in his last speech. But indications are that these operations may be confined to the Mediterranean, with either Sicily or the Greek islands the first target. So far as Western Europe is concerned, the air school of thought is in the ascendancy and it appears that the Summer is to be devoted to an attempt to bomb Germany into surrender. Undoubtedly the terrific hammering of the Ruhr is proving very effective in reducing both German production and morale. But even if this industrial area is wiped off the map, Germany may still be able to carry on unless forced to expend its resources in resisting actual invasion of its fortress.

THE FAILURE OF EAMON DE VALERA'S PARTY, the Fianna Fail, to obtain a majority in last week's Irish elections may have far-reaching consequences on the relations between Britain and Eire. Although discontent with De Valera's neutrality policy ostensibly had no influence on the results, an analysis of the returns shows that the voters tended to blame the government for domestic difficulties that grew out of De Valera's foreign policy. The party achieving the most spectacular gains in the election was not the conservative Fine Gael led by William T. Cosgrave, but the Farmers' Party, whose remarkable showing reflected the prevailing dissatisfaction with the effects of isolationism on Eire's agricultural economy. The success of the Labor Party in doubling its representation in the Dail is attributed to the resentment of the workers against the government's policy of pegging wages while the cost of living has soared. It is not yet clear whether De Valera will be forced out as a consequence of his defeat or obtain enough independent support to remain in power. His resignation would be welcome news in London. While there seems little likelihood that even a coalition government embracing all the present opposition groups would abandon neutrality in the war, such a government would undoubtedly seek a basis for closer economic and political relations with Britain. As a minimum, this should bring a check on the espionage activities of the Axis in Eire and possibly a suspension of diplomatic relations with the Axis powers. But the long-standing dispute over the status of Ulster remains as a rocky barrier to any final settlement between Eire and Britain.

THE RUMORS OF AN AGREEMENT BETWEEN General Franco and the Spanish Pretender may be untrue or at least premature. But there are many indications that the old British plan of placing Don Juan on the throne has lately been revived with apparent support from the Vatican and certain influential American Catholics. It is not, however, supported by the Spanish people, the majority of whom remain as Republican as they were in 1931, when Don Juan's father was forced from the throne by an overwhelming vote. The suggestion that the United Nations might, through a restoration of the monarchy, secure the friendship of Spain, is hardly impressive. It is not the Monarchists but the common people of Spain who are our allies; it is they who fought for three years against our present enemies while the Monarhcists fought on the other side. What is needed in Spain in place of the hated Franco regime is not a discredited dynasty but a government that represents the will of the Spanish people. To restore the throne in Spain would make sense only as part of a general plan to establish reaction in post-war Europe. It could have no other meaning.

SO LITTLE NEWS HAS COME OUT OF INDIA in recent weeks that the average American is apt to assume that the British have the situation there completely in hand. This, we are assured by competent observers, is far from being the case. While the wave of sabotage—largely unreported in this country—that accompanied Gandhi's hunger strike has died down, India as a whole is still in a ferment of discontent. It is widely predicted that in the event of another hunger strike Britain would be unable to keep the railways operating. The military position of the United Nations in India would thus be seriously endangered. This is of particular concern to the United States since the American troops in India are located several hundred miles from the coast and are completely dependent on a single railway line. Of even greater concern to American strategists is the effect of British Indian policy on United Nations plans for the reconquest of Burma, Thailand, and Indo-China. A year ago American troops would have been welcomed in any of these countries; but as a result of America's failure to intercede in India the attitude of native populations has undergone a marked change. No longer is a sharp distinction made between the British and Americans. American landings in any of these countries would have to overcome at least some native resistance. The appointment of General Wavell as Viceroy of India does not indicate any change in British policy. In most quarters it is felt that only strong intervention by President Roosevelt on the ground of protecting our troops can effect a change in time to aid in the coming United Nations offensive against Japan.

THE HEART OF THE NEW REPORT RELEASED by the Kilgore committee lies in its warning that if the Office of War Mobilization displays "the weaknesses of its predecessors and confines itself to the adjudication of personal and agency disputes, it cannot but fail." It might have added that everything one knows of James F. Byrnes, its director, leads one to believe that he will confine himself to this umpiring task among contending agencies. But that will not be enough to achieve what the committee rightly says we need, "a vigorous policy of programming, scheduling, and actively directing the war agencies in the performance of their mutually dependent programs." Instead of moving in that direction, Byrnes is now trying to stop the work of the Kilgore committee and place all investigation of the war program in the hands of one picked committee which the war agencies and departments can control. Unfortunately, while Under Secretary of War Patterson is courageous enough to protest publicly against the lag in war production and the over-confidence and complacency it reflects, he is still letting himself be used by the army-navy bureaucracy to fight the establishment of the kind of over-all agency which alone can end that lag.

A FRUITFUL FIELD WOULD HAVE OPENED for our native bigots, alien-baiters, and witch-hunters had the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the government's effort to revoke the citizenship of William Schneiderman. "If, seventeen years after a federal court adjudged him entitled to be a citizen," Justice Rutledge said in a concurring opinion, "that judgment can be nullified and he can be stripped of this most precious right by nothing more than reexamination upon the merits of the very facts the judgment established, no naturalized person's citizenship is or can be secure." Schneiderman would have been penalized for membership in a party to which native Americans may legally belong. Imposition of that penalty would have jeopardized not merely naturalized Communists but any naturalized leftists or trade unionists who might some day seem imperfectly attached to what a Dies considers the spirit of the Constitution. The country owes a debt of gratitude to Wendell Willkie for having argued the case and to Justice Murphy and his colleagues of the majority for having upheld his argument. If a belief in the right of revolution is un-American, then Jefferson and Lincoln —among many others—were un-American.

Defeat at Detroit

THE Axis is losing battles in Europe and the Pacific, but it can console itself with victories recently won in the United States. In Mobile, Los Angeles, Beaumont, and Detroit Americans infected with the spirit of fascism have attacked our fighting forces in the rear, damaging production and, what is far worse, shattering democratic morale. A succession of Detroits could conceivably mean the loss of the war; it would certainly mean the loss of the peace.

It is time for us to clear our minds and hearts of the contradictions that are rotting our moral position and undermining our purpose. We cannot fight fascism abroad while turning a blind eye to fascism at home. We cannot inscribe on our banners: For democracy and a caste system." We cannot liberate oppressed peoples while maintaining the right to oppress our own minorities. As Horace R. Cayton writes in an article on page 10, "There must be achieved in America and in the world a moral order which will include the American Negro and all other oppressed peoples. . . . In terms of the safety and welfare of our country and of our way of life, the struggle for the rights of the American Negro is as important as the struggle for military victory over the enemy."

Most intelligent and socially responsible Americans would give at least lip-service to this sentiment. They would not attempt to defend denial of opportunity, social inequality, exclusion from the polls, or segregation. They know such things are incompatible with democratic ideals, but they shy from the implications of their own moral standards, and like James Boyd, in his article in last week's Nation, urge the Negroes not to raise awkward issues, to trust to gradual reform, to take a historical perspective. The alternative, Mr. Boyd suggested, was explosion, and perhaps he would point to the Detroit riots as the kind of incident which an aggressive Negro policy made inevitable.

Mr. Cayton sharply disagrees with Mr. Boyd's arguments, but that does not mean that he or any other responsible Negro leader advocates a policy of violence. He points out that since America is at present deeply concerned with living up to democratic principles, it is the logical moment for the Negro to seek to improve his position. Nor can his claims to justice be abated in order to check hostility, for every improvement in his status provokes reaction from the bigots. Even Mr. Boyd's program of concentration on the economic front is no guaranty against explosions. Indeed, the root of the trouble in Detroit seems to have been largely economic. For there the Negro is working side by side with the white man on equal terms, to the fury of those whose first object in life is "to keep the nigger in his place."

Detroit is a tense, overworked, overcrowded city. It has experienced a large influx of workers, both white and colored, since the war began. They are earning high wages but finding it difficult to enjoy them, and they are constantly aware of the uncertainty of the future when the war orders cease to pour in. This atmosphere of insecurity has proved favorable to the professional promotion of hatred, and Detroit has become an important center of the Klan as well as the headquarters of Gerald L. K. Smith's anti-Semitic, anti-foreign America First Party and a dozen lesser breeders of social and racial strife. Of course, the outburst of mob violence last week was "spontaneous" in the sense that the time, place, and manner of the outbreak was not controlled by an organized group. But the spirit that inflamed the rioters and led to indiscriminate attacks of Negroes was the result of deliberate propaganda, and if its creators were not directly inspired by the Axis, they were doing its work.

The authorities in Michigan are reported to be launching a sociological study of the causes of the riots. That can do no harm and may do some good in the long run. But if other outbreaks in the near future are to be prevented, the police and the FBI should seek the focal points of infection. The majesty of the law cannot kill prejudice, but it can do much more than has been done in Detroit.

Another urgent necessity is an attempt to instil into the police a realization that it is their duty to protect Negroes as well as whites. Most of the victims of the Detroit riots were Negroes, and so were most of those arrested. When the white mobs ran amok, pulling Negroes from automobiles and street cars, the police seem to have done little to intervene. But when the Negroes began to retaliate on white property, the police were quick to use both night sticks and guns. One picture, published in the New York Times, showed a Negro under arrest being hit in the face by a white hoodlum. The two policemen holding his arms appear to be making no move to intervene. It is a striking symbol of uneven-handed justice.

The tendency of the police to take sides—a similar attitude was reported from Los Angeles during the "zoot-suit riots"—naturally encourages the white bullies, while it drives the Negroes to a despairing belief that they must provide their own protection with whatever means are available. Equality before the law is one of the fundamental rights of American citizens which has all too often been honored in the breach, particularly in the case of clashes between Negroes and whites. The Negro cannot afford to remain patient about this denial of justice or the refusal of any of the fundamental rights of a citizen. To remain passive is to accept the status of a second-class American—a phrase which white and colored alike ought to reject as a blasphemous contradiction in terms. Until Americans do so we have no right to say complacently: "We are not as these Herrenvolk . . ."

Coalition Against DeGaulle

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

IF THIS journal held the position of extreme partisanship for General de Gaulle with which it is sometimes charged, it would applaud every recent move made by the British and Americans in Algiers. For by their intervention in support of General Giraud, and particularly by their insistence on his continued control of the French army in North and West Africa, they have elevated De Gaulle from his position as leader of French resistance to the Axis to a much more exalted role as a leader of French resistance to all foreign domination. Giraud, on the other hand, has become a British-American stooge. And this, as I suggested above, must be very gratifying to people whose Gaullism is stronger than their wish for genuine Allied unity in the common fight against our still powerful and defiant enemies.

But we don't like it. It shows, as Mr. del Vayo points out on a later page, that Allied political strategy is still totally unrelated to the popular desires of this war-torn world. And this means that the two leading democratic powers are losing—if they have not already lost—their claim to popular leadership. Instead of backing representative, aggressive, fighting elements, they continue to maintain in power men whose connections are with the discredited past. Giraud is hardly to blame for the thankless part he now plays. He came to North Africa with the reputation of a disinterested patriot; he lost his reputation in the company of Darlan, Noguès, and other rascals for whose presence the Allied leaders were chiefly responsible. If those leaders had wanted the only kind of unity between Giraud and De Gaulle that would rally the support of the people and the fighting forces of France, they would have encouraged Giraud to purge the army and accept the reforms for which the De Gaullists have been fighting. But they preferred to maintain the status quo even at the cost of unity. And so they have succeeded in perpetuating confusion and rivalry.

The divided command they have forced upon De Gaulle means in reality a divided army. There will be an independent French army—headed by De Gaulle. There will be mass desertions. There will be bitter jurisdictional rows over recruiting rights. Loyalty to leaders will be exalted over loyalty to the common cause. And out of it all will come a further loss of democratic prestige by our own country and Britain.

I am not talking about some distant future. These effects are being felt today. Last Sunday Drew Middleton wrote in the New York Times that the "only organized, dynamic political force in North Africa at present is General de Gaulle's Fighting French movement." General Giraud's victory, he concluded, "must be considered a temporary one" since it is not likely to survive the withdrawal of Allied support; and Allied support will presumably end when the Allied armies have left North Africa. Middleton leaves no doubt that popular feeling for De Gaulle has been increased by the intervention of Britain and America on the side of Giraud. In the Middle East also, strong resentment is boiling up. A private cable from a well-informed American in Beirut brings word that Frenchmen in the army and in civil life are unable to comprehend "continued Allied support of Giraud at the expense of De Gaulle and the pro-democratic elements grouped around him." Their indignation is mixed with fears of the future. Perhaps they are less certain than Mr. Middleton that Giraud's leadership, and that of the reactionary officers who retain their commissions in the army under his command, will end when the Allied forces withdraw from Africa. On the contrary, they fear a very different result: a French colonial army largely officered by reactionaries crossing from North Africa to "liberate" France according to some new formula of authoritarian control. That the United States and Britain should be suspected of contriving to bring about such a result is evidence of the growing suspicion and dislike with which freedem-loving Frenchmen regard their powerful Allies.

The whole dismal policy of the United States toward De Gaulle and the Fighting French is neatly illustrated in the interview with General Charles Mast appearing on a later page of this issue. The new Resident General of Tunisia tells the story of the intricate and fascinating plot which led to the American-British expedition to North Africa. But the General reveals some brand new facts; for the first time we learn of the major role played by himself and by other De Gaullist sympathizers in preparing the way for the Allied landings. Who in America ever heard before that General Mast was the man who carried on the preliminary negotiations with the American envoy, Robert D. Murphy? Why were we never told that the widespread conspiracy to seize the towns, arrest hostile officials and army men, and open the gates to the American troops was carried out by civilians, most of them De Gaullists?

General Mast's version of these events, completely contradicting the reports allowed to reach American ears, seems to me to have an importance which more deliberate revelations often lack. It proves with unpleasant finality that the American authorities in North Africa deliberately withheld credit from men who had risked their lives to help our forces and whose help we had readily accepted. It proves that they suppressed all facts that might have reflected honor on the Fighting French. There may be some decent explanation for such behavior, but for the moment I can't think of any.

Bureaucrat Bites Press

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 25

IT'S always news when a bureaucrat bites the press, and Elmer Davis, who has been in the business long enough, might have expected trouble when he made that speech to the Newspaper Guild. The newspapers, which dish it out all day long, are notoriously unable to take it. None of us (your correspondent included) hesitate to pass with majestic certitude on the most complex of technical subjects. But let the worm turn, and lecture the press—though the worm be, like Davis, one of ourselves—and the editors run screaming for their shillelaghs. Ours is a sensitive profession.

Were the nation's editors good sports, they would accept with equanimity lectures much less justified than Davis's. He may not have told the whole truth—who can aspire to that?—but he did tell a part of the truth we all tend to overlook. Since newspaper comment by this time has succeeded in thoroughly confusing the public as to just what dreadful things Davis did say, and the fate of the OWI may now hang on it, it may be well to glance back at the horrid words actually uttered in Boston. Davis complained that in most newspapers "Washington bureaucrat is a term of abuse; and Washington has become a synonym for muddle, confusion, and bickering." The truth of this can be checked in anyone's morning newspaper. That rank-and-file working newspapermen admit this was clear from the enthusiastic reception given the speech by the Newspaper Guild. Most of the barking comes from the front office and the trained seals.

Davis admitted that "we are not doing our jobs as well as we should . . . some of us have indulged in unseemly bickering," and all this, he said, "has been dutifully and copiously reported by the vigilant corps of Washington correspondents." His retort, if it was a retort, was couched, tactfully enough, as explanation. "It is the function of these men," he continued, "to report current news and to cover Washington; it is not their business to seek historical parallels, or to contrast Washington with other capitals of the world. If it were, they might have discovered that muddle, confusion, and bickering, however deplorable, are characteristic of most human activity at all times and all places, and particularly characteristic of capitals in war time. They exist in the capitals of our allies; they exist in the capitals of our enemies too." To say this too often would lead to complacency. But surely it needs to be said occasionally. Criticism is healthy, but so is perspective. To start by casting out the beam from my own eye, I think Mr. Davis's words provide a counterbalance which the reader of my own constantly critical Washington letters may usefully keep in mind.

I do not intend to cease wielding my own little sledge hammer, and I am not suggesting that the newspapers content themselves with printing OWI releases. But I see nothing heinous in what Davis said, and I wonder whether the uproar it created was not due in part to uneasy consciences. It may not be the business of the press to seek comforting historical parallels, but I suspect many newspapers would make that their business if we had a conservative or reactionary President of whom they approved. Though quite a few papers, like the Republican New York Herald Tribune, have succeeded in admirable fashion in keeping partisanship within proper limits, many are still carrying on the old hate-Roosevelt campaign. Others, which roar so bravely about bureaucracy—like sin, undefended—are mouselike when they touch occasionally, if at all, on the shortcomings of the big-business crowd which has largely been running the war effort. The attention paid to bickering in the capital is in part due to the natural weakness of newspapermen for the dramatic headline. In part it reflects a familiar tendency to evade more fundamental issues by concentrating attention on personalities.

The most unfortunate part of the cry-baby outburst by the press as a whole is that it distracted attention from Davis's attack upon the Hearst-McCormick-Patterson axis. Davis said that "in the case of a few newspapers —very few" the impression that Washington is all muddle "has been deliberately created, for reasons on which I would prefer not to speculate." Davis thought it "sufficient to note" that "their attacks on bureaucracy are only a minor phase of what appears to be a carefully planned and assiduously executed editorial policy, which, whatever its attitude toward our own war effort, often seems actuated by a greater hostility to some of our allies than to some of our enemies." Perhaps so few joined in this condemnation of the Hearst-McCormick-Patterson press because of the powerful business interests these papers serve and the hate-Roosevelt chorus they swell.

Much can be said in criticism of the OWI, but little of that will be found in the intemperate and bigoted debate in which the House voted to abolish the domestic branch of the OWI altogether. There is too little adult discussion of our problems in Washington, too much puerile boasting, and this has helped create a dangerous atmosphere of complacency. But the officials chiefly responsible for this are the President, Byrnes, Nelson, most but not all of the dollar-a-year men (especially Jeffers), Secretary of the Navy Knox, and the general run of "brass hats." From this last category I would honorably except the Under Secretaries of War and Navy, most of the Assistant Secretaries, General Somervell, and many of the generals in the field, notably Stilwell, whose manly frankness is in such sharp contrast to the hooey so frequent in the department communiqués. The worst and principal offender is Mr. Roosevelt himself. He likes neither to be told nor to tell unpleasant facts.

Considering the difficulties under which the OWI must operate and the natural reluctance of politicians and business men—like the rest of us—to be too frank about their work, the OWI has done extraordinarily well. Its general reporting and some of its special reports on rubber, planes, and Willow Run have been extremely honest; it has had a good effect on army and navy communiqués, which can be amazingly silly, as they were in their piecemeal admission about the Japanese invasion of the Aleutians. The domestic branch of the OWI has two advantages over the previous set-up, the one to which we shall return if the Senate does not restore the appropriation voted down by the House. The first is an advantage for the newspapers: the OWI provides a central source of information in place of myriad information agencies. The second is an advantage for the public. An information officer attached directly to an important public official is at his mercy. The OWI gives the information officer greater leverage in getting out the truth because he can appeal to an independent information chief with a Presidential directive. This often makes a good deal of difference.

These and other relevant considerations played no part whatever in the attack made upon the OWI in the House. The first consideration was that of partisan politics. The Republicans in the House caucused on the OWI, and the elimination of the domestic branch was made a party matter, though both the former and the new head of that branch and probably half its executives are Republicans. The second consideration was race prejudice. Within a few days of the terrible Detroit riots a majority of the members of the House of Representatives were so lacking in a sense of responsibility to their country in a time of war as to deliver a slap in the face to our largest minority, the Negroes. The Republicans out of partisanship and the Southern Democrats out of a blind bigotry punished Davis for the OWI's excellent pamphlet "Negroes and the War." "My boy in England and my boy in Africa," Allen of Louisiana cried, "don't need any Elmer Davis of the New York American Labor Party to tell them what the war is about. They learned from Southern Democrats." I shudder to think what they learned.

A third consideration apparent in the debate was Davis's failure to share that "greater hostility to some of our allies" which is as often expressed on the floor of the House as in the Hearst-McCormick-Patterson press. Though Davis fought the Communists hard in the American Labor Party, he never succumbed to the paranoia of the professional anti-reds. The OWI is run on a truly anti-fascist basis; its personnel includes men of any political shade who are sincerely opposed to the Axis and its ideology, and it treats the Soviet Union as an ally, an attitude often strikingly absent in Congress. On the air last April 30 Davis declared that the Nazi story of the Polish corpses discovered miraculously preserved at Smolensk "looks very fishy" and commented on the difficulties Premier Sikorsky has with "a faction of extremists—the sort of men, void of any sense of political realities, who ruined Poland in the eighteenth century." Davis's reward was an attack by Lesinski of Michigan, whose proposal that all OWI propaganda abroad be handed over to the State Department was widely approved in the House, though it will be greeted elsewhere with dismay. The State Department has been carrying on covert propaganda against the OWI, for the ideology which dominates the department is also the ideology of most Southern Democrats.

It would take more space than I have at my disposal to cover the bald misstatements which figured in the House debate. Taber, ranking Republican member of the House Appropriations Committee, was cheap, unprincipled, and vicious. He said the domestic branch of the OWI was asking a 300 per cent increase in personnel; the increase asked was 18 per cent. Taber's second, Wigglesworth, said the committee was not provided with transcripts of the foreign broadcasts; a box containing several hundred was sent to Taber. Wigglesworth said he would place the overseas work of the OWI under the army and navy; in all areas of actual or projected military operations it is under the chiefs of staff. Lesinski said mention of Mihailovich "is taboo" on OWI broadcasts; his name is frequently used. "What is wrong with the army and navy giving out their own statements?" Allen of Louisiana asked. "They did it in the First World War." They didn't in the First World War. They do now. The OWI is consulted, but army and navy communiqués are issued by commanding officers in the field or by the War and Navy Departments here.

The 300 pages of testimony given by Davis and his aides before the House Appropriations Committee last month provide a far different impression of the OWI from the House debate, a debate in which the House Democratic leadership did little if anything to support the OWI. Taber and Wigglesworth were at those hearings and spoke later on the floor more from malice than ignorance. In the hearings one saw the tribute paid the OWI by General Marshall and other army chiefs, the useful role it played in preparing the North African landings, the handicaps, caused by inadequate funds and facilities, under which it operates as compared with our enemies. The short-wave facilities of the Nazis and Italians are ten times as great as ours; our lack of them made it possible for the Japanese to put the news of the Tunisian victories on the air their own way four hours before we could.

These crucial matters seem of no importance to this cantankerous, bigoted, and criminally irresponsible Congress.

Let's Look at Labor

II. NEW TASKS FOR TRADE UNIONS

BY LAWRENCE ROGIN

CAN a labor organization which has built up its strength by obtaining economic gains for its members, primarily through collective bargaining, keep the loyalty of its members in a period when questions of wages, hours, and overtime pay have been almost entirely removed from the sphere of collective bargaining by government action? This problem has been occupying thinking trade unionists since the start of the war. Recently it has been brought into sharp focus by the President's anti-inflationary orders, which seem to remove the possibility of wage increases, except in a few instances, and certainly prevent any union from gaining strength by the time-honored technique of campaigning for a general rise in pay.

The bitter reaction of John L. Lewis when the President's "hold the line" order caught him in the midst of negotiations for contracts covering almost every coal miner in the country is evidence of the frustration felt by old-line unionists in the present situation. For even when union membership has been held by closed-shop contracts, the American labor movement has counted on maintaining union morale by means of its ability to obtain constant improvements. This characteristic of American trade unionism, glorified as "job consciousness" by labor theorists during the Coolidge prosperity days in contrast to the class consciousness of European labor, revealed its futility by its failure to build a labor movement in that period or to hold together what had been built when unemployment and depression set in and economic gains were no longer possible.

So far as Mr. Lewis is concerned, there seems no hope for a new approach to the problem. For in effect the miners' leader has said, "It's no use even trying to stop inflation. Let's give the miners all they want, the farmers all they want, the industrialists a fair profit, and let the devil take the hindmost." Mr. Lewis has admitted that he cannot think of union service to his membership at this time in any other terms than higher wages. No fair-minded person would challenge his statement that most miners are underpaid, that the cost of living has been rising, that corporation profits are too high. Yet we must wonder whether trade unionists in general would agree that a drive for higher wages backed up by strike action is the only solution for labor's present problems. Congress has already indicated the political effect of such action, and at this writing the miners' strike has not been won.

If governmental restrictions upon collective bargaining have taken from the labor movement the possibility of building union strength upon immediate gains, how can the unions keep the support of their memberships in the face of such attacks as those made recently by reactionaries in the state legislatures of Kansas and Texas and by the anti-labor bloc in Congress? How can labor so maintain its strength that it can be assured of a voice in writing the peace and in building a new America?

If trade unionism is thought of only in terms of collective bargaining there can be no such assurance, even though collective bargaining, as Clinton S. Golden and Harold Ruttenburg, officials of the United Steel Workers, have ably pointed out, encompasses many things that may be more vital to the worker than an increase in pay. Union grievance machinery has worked overtime handling problems of work loads, job reclassification, seniority, promotions, layoffs, and discharges which have arisen as a result of the conversion of industry to war production. Every new change in production methods brings a new opportunity for the union to prove its worth. The restrictions on wages and overtime pay, the shifting of workers from job to job provide many problems for the shop steward and full-time union representative. If an individual worker is helpless when dealing with an employer, how much more so he becomes before the complexities of War Labor Board or Manpower Commission rulings. Yet the efficient handling of grievances, so essential if the union is to remain strong, does not arouse militant support. Alone it cannot evoke the loyalty and understanding required in the present situation.

The union movement must make its major appeal outside the collective-bargaining field. It must prove to the American worker that his union can be an agency for achieving a full life for him and his family. It must show him the close relationship between economics and politics and how governmental action on national, state, and local levels can affect his welfare. It must demonstrate that collective action by the workers can provide better housing, decent price controls, and proper education for his children, as well as protection in the shop, and that these things are equally important to him.

The war has given labor this challenge—and at the same time an opportunity that must not be missed. For the changes brought by the war have opened workers' minds to problems up to now ignored. The American worker has never asked his union to protect him as consumer; yet that is one of the tasks which American labor must undertake today. Locally and nationally labor must act to prevent runaway prices and to maintain quality standards. What labor has attempted in this field is more important than a score of wage increases. While Congress, under the whip of the farm bloc and organized business, has been sabotaging every effort at price control, the labor movement alone has been fighting back with real force.

Crowded living conditions and the shortage of doctors have given the worker a concern for decent housing, for adequate medical care. Rationing has forced him to think about nutrition standards. The demand for labor has called his attention to the need for nursery schools. High prices lead him to think about cooperatives. Here are immediate fields of service for the union, which can stimulate both community action and legislation.

The worker worries, too, about what is going to happen after the war. Soldiers in the production lines, like those at the front, want to know that the war is not being fought in vain. Without understanding them too well, the worker is attracted by the Beveridge plan and the report of our National Resources Planning Board. He must be educated to realize that the union is the only agency in America for turning these aspirations into realities.

Even as the worker's mind is opening to new problems, so the tight anti-labor communities are finding it necessary, whether they like it or not, to recognize that unions exist. OPA regulations, now finally being enforced, require union representation on local price-control and rationing boards. The Office of Civilian Defense has a similar policy, though it lacks the machinery for enforcement. The cooperation of labor is needed if bond drives are to be put across and if community war chests are to be filled. Labor's relief committees have done an outstanding job in this respect. Even promoters of schemes for assuring proper nutrition go to the unions for indorsement these days rather than to employers.

How well has the labor movement met this challenge? What has it done to take advantage of these opportunities? The best that can be said is that a beginning has been made. The activities program of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union has been broadened to meet war demands. A few unions, among them the C. I. O. United Automobile Workers, have attempted to develop full-fledged victory programs which would reach from the national office down through the membership and affect almost every phase of the worker's existence. For the most part, however, action has been sporadic, its extent depending on the pressure exerted by the national organization, the local situation, and the willingness of overburdened union representatives to undertake new responsibilities. Unfortunately, too, unions which have engaged in community war activities have often stopped after the bond and war-chest drives were completed.

Limited as the effort has been, the results indicate that the job can be done. Even before Pearl Harbor the Shipbuilding Workers experimented with a cooperative housing project. The United Automobile Workers have recently revived their Medical Bureau. The example set some time ago by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in providing insurance coverage for a large part of its membership has been followed recently by the Textile Workers' Union of America (C. I. O.) in a number of contracts. Union-sponsored consumers' centers in Newark, New Jersey, and Reading, Pennsylvania, have served entire communities. Child-care centers are being established in many areas as the result of union interest. Labor representatives are starting to function as members of rationing boards, and local labor pressures are backing the efforts of the OPA Labor Advisory Committee to make price control real. Local union legislative committees are writing to their Congressmen on such subjects as rent control, grade labeling of canned goods, and appropriations for the FSA, as well as on matters traditionally more in labor's province. Both branches of the labor movement are claiming credit for the new Wagner-Murray-Dingell social-security bill, and the unions have made at least a gesture toward the consideration of post-war problems. One union has made a really serious effort to concentrate its members' attention on the subject.

These activities, taken separately, are hardly enough to catch the imagination of the American worker. As part of a well-organized social program consciously sponsored by the national labor federations and their constituent unions, they could inspire enthusiasm and loyalty. Such a program, interpreted by an effective educational campaign and supported by unified political activity, would be more than an answer to the Rickenbackers; it would be the beginning of a new labor movement in America.

The Negro's Challenge

BY HORACE R. CAYTON

[Last week James Boyd, a Southern liberal, urged the Negroes to be patient and to avoid policies which might provoke explosions. Below, a well-known Negro newspaperman replies in an article which, although completed some time before the riots in Detroit, provides a significant commentary on those and other recent racial disturbances. Our own views on the problems discussed in these two articles and on the recrudescence of mob violence directed against minorities will be found in the editorial section.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

THE United States stands frozen and paralyzed before its Negro problem. The divergent and contradictory streams of thought in its culture prevent it from even conceiving of a rational approach to a solution. The United States thinks of itself as a political democracy but knows that it maintains a semi-caste system within its social order. It believes itself to be a good nation, dedicated to the brotherhood of man, but it has never fully included the Negro in its political, economic, and social system. Now, facing the problem in an acute stage, it is unable to plan or to act to meet the impending crisis.

The Negro problem is not new in this country. But since the war, as a result of the conflict of ideologies, it has become a world problem, and the United States must now do something about it. It must act not merely for moral reasons, to right the social injustices involved, but for motives of self-interest, indeed, of self-preservation.

We are fighting a yellow nation which has challenged white imperialism and ridiculed the so-called democracies for clinging to the notion of white superiority. We have a yellow nation as an ally, and we are desperately trying to hold in check the brown people of India. Japanese references to our treatment of the American Negro embarrass all of our attempts at psychological warfare. Every time a Negro is lynched here, the Japanese broadcast the event to China, India, and South America. The stupid racial policy of the Anglo-Saxon nations was an important factor in their defeat in the Pacific. The United Nations will have the task after the war of setting up a new balance of power based upon a moral order which, to be workable, must include yellow, brown, and black people. How can America share in this when it does not include its own black citizens in the moral order prevailing within its own boundaries?

There is another reason why the contradiction of caste and democracy must be resolved. To develop its maximum striking power, in the factories, the fields, and the armed forces, the nation cannot ignore one-tenth of its people. The sheer need for man-power is opening more and more opportunities to Negroes. But though many advances have been made, millions of Negroes are still idle or working in non-essential industries because Northern farmers refuse to employ them, many defense plants limit their participation by a quota system, and the armed forces relegate them to limited services.

And how about the Negroes; how do they feel? Many white persons who have inquired have been frightened by the answers they obtained. A change so profound that few persons realize its fateful meaning is taking place in the mentality of the American Negro. He has experienced of late an upsurge of feeling which has given him a new sense of his own dignity and of his relationship to world events.

The forces bringing about this change antedate our participation in the war. Negroes throughout the United States were aware and resentful of the rape of Ethiopia. Haile Selassie was to them a hero, and relatives of his in this country addressed numerous Negro audiences. Various Negro newspapers first developed mass circulation through the appeal of the Ethiopian issue and the rise of Joe Louis.

In the present conflict the Negro is finding the problems of the Chinese, the Indians, and the Burmese strangely similar to his own. In this sense the Negro has become more international-minded than the rest of the population. His sympathy with other colored peoples was aroused long before the general population had begun to question America's policy of isolationism. He came to have a certain respect for the Japanese, who had successfully fought three white nations, though his hope for the representation of dark people in the Allied peace rests with the Chinese. Realizing more acutely than whites the global significance of a guaranty of democratic rights and privileges to all peoples of the world, he has broken out of his caste-bound mentality, transcended his purely racial point of view (which led him only to despair), and now sees his position in society as identified with that of the darker races of the world.

The war has confronted the Negro with a situation which has forced him to sharpen his thinking and define for himself the role which he wishes to play in American civilization. The conflict between the pressure which was forcing him into a caste position and the slogans for democracy which raised his expectation of complete citizenship have developed in him a new critical consideration of his position in the social structure of the country and a new attitude toward the theory and practice of democracy. At first this new capacity for critical analysis seemed to be expressed in a series of complaints. Brought up sharply against the paradoxes of democracy, the Negro in this initial stage of the development of a line of action could do little more than articulate his discontent. But in the crucible of frustration and despair he is developing a new and positive line of thought which holds hope for black people and for the institution of democracy. He is adopting a point of view that is not inconsistent with the expressed aims of the United Nations.

The change in the Negro's mentality has come about so rapidly that few people—even Negroes—realize its extent. It is expressed in his refusal to accept segregation without complaint even in the armed forces—numbers of Negroes have gone to prison rather than fight in a Jim Crow army—in impetuous individual defiance of cultural patterns of racial subordination, in the hysterical oratory of excited speakers for Negro rights. But underneath all this is a determination to become a full citizen, to plan and think for himself regardless of past friends and old leaders.

The basic issues in the Negro's struggle have changed. While at first Negro demands were simply for Negro rights, now they are for democratic rights for all peoples throughout the world. While at first many Negroes were sullen and wished to see this country brought to its knees and made to realize that without them the war could not be won, and while at first they wished to withhold their participation until certain concessions were granted, now they are demanding the right to participate in every phase of the war so that they can also participate in the peace. Demands for concessions have given way to demands for equality.

As for the white people, many are reacting to the Negro's new attitude with fear or hate. In the South, and often in other parts of the country too, they fear that their prerogatives are being challenged. They are infuriated by the Negro press and in terror of the emotions which they sense behind the mask-like countenance of their once humble black servants. Southern Congressmen form alliances with reactionary Northern tories to stifle all legislation which might help ease racial tensions; middle-class people form leagues to maintain white supremacy; the former Southern liberals caution Negroes to be patient; and the Lumpenproletariat whips itself up into a lynch mood. Of course, the Wendell Willkies, the Pearl Bucks, and the Bishop Sheils are trying to cope with the problem, but they are a minority.

In the face of these conflicts and tensions the Administration is bankrupt. As a matter of fact, the government cannot openly take cognizance of the Negro problem. The logic of our democratic culture forbids definitely assigning to the Negro a subordinate status, while the Southern poll-tax Congressmen block any positive propaganda of action for national unity. Officially the Negro cannot be given even a promise of liberation which will make him willing to wait and hope as the English expect the people of India to wait and hope. The myth of democracy is, indeed, often used to prevent the employment of the most elementary mechanisms for racial adjustments. A case in point was the attempt of Southern Congressmen to eliminate the race-relations division of the Federal Housing Agency, because "this is a democracy and we don't need to consider the Negro as different from anyone else."

Many white liberals, North and South, appalled at the situation, have counseled the Negro to be patient. They have pointed out the gains which have accrued to him during the last three Administrations and reviewed the progress the Negroes have made in the past three hundred years. They assume that because of their past friendship Negroes should have faith in them and in their analysis of the possibilities and dangers of aggressive action by Negroes at this moment.

What many white liberals do not realize is that they are measuring the gains with an obsolete yardstick. At a time when peoples are being liquidated or given equality overnight, gradualism has little meaning. With a world revolution in progress one group of people cannot be held apart from the stream of thought and told to have faith in education and good-will. To ask the American Negro to go slowly is to attempt either to slacken the international pace of social change or to isolate the Negro from the world forces in which he is engulfed.

The direct antithesis of this so-called gradualism should not be thought of as an eruption of violence. Such an eventuality may result from too rapid change, but if it does, the explosion is not the measure of the pressure exerted by the Negro to rise in status; it is the measure of the reaction of whites against his rise. Changes in race relations should be thought of as a continuum, and to make gradualism, which is a rate of speed of change, and explosion, which is a possible result of too rapid change, opposite poles is to confuse the analysis of race relations.

The likelihood of success for a non-violent change is determined to a large extent by the social circumstances prevailing when the change is attempted. A minority finds its best opportunity to advance at a time when its claims for equal rights and privileges are in accord with the social aims of the dominant group. Since America is just now deeply concerned not only with living up to democratic principles at home but, together with other United Nations, with guaranteeing democracy to all peoples everywhere, the present is a logical time for the Negro to seek to improve his position. Those who want Negroes voluntarily to relinquish their claims to democratic rights and privileges are either not willing to put their ideologies to the test of reality or are denying by inference that this global war is being fought for the right of peoples everywhere to be free.

The Negro is in many respects making a more rational analysis of contemporary events than many who would give him counsel. The struggle in which we are engaged is one against oppression—whether from the tyrannical forces of Hitler, Mussolini, and Hirohito, or from the colonial imperialism of the British Empire, or from the racial imperialism of the United States. To win a cheap military victory over the Axis and then to continue the exploitation of subject peoples within the British Empire and the subordination of Negroes in the United States is to set the stage for the next world war—probably a war of color.

The manner in which the present war is prosecuted will determine the peace which is achieved and the new world order which is established. Writing the peace is not a process that begins with the declaration of an armistice. The movement of men, the opening of fronts, the political deals made during the war shape the peace long before the diplomats sit around a table. The participation of China, of India, and of all the dark peoples, including the American Negro, will constitute a moral claim which cannot be ignored by the United Nations.

When two worlds are at war—the world of fascism and the world of democracy—any hope for the brotherhood of man can arise only out of the struggle of people united for a common end. To insure a victory for the common man, who has too often been mobilized to fight for a noble objective only to find himself cheated by selfish interests when a military victory was won, the essential elements of brotherhood must be achieved during the struggle itself. Brotherhood is both the means and the end of the struggle. This to many people is as rational as is the theory of gradualism or counting small gains. The Negro by refusing to accept gradualism may be helping America to save itself, helping to establish the new world order which must eventually come if Western civilization is not lost to fascist reaction.

This is not a program of action except in the most general sense. Any "pat" solution—any formula—should be regarded with great caution. Perhaps the first step toward a solution should be the realization that the problem of the American Negro is a world problem, that it is part of the problem of all the common people of the world. Somehow, through some mechanism, there must be achieved in America and in the world a moral order which will include the American Negro and all other oppressed peoples. The present war must be considered as one phase of a larger struggle to achieve this new moral order. Nothing must blind us to the necessity of securing the larger victory. In terms of the safety and welfare of our country and of our way of life, the struggle for the rights of the American Negro is as important as the struggle for military victory over the enemy.

THE BILL passed the other day by the Senate, . . . making eight hours a legal day's labor in all government yards and workshops, is not particularly important as regards its effect on the government service. . . . The Plot That Took Algiers

BY MICHAEL K. CLARK

[We have always been led to believe that the French elements with which Robert D. Murphy and General Mark Clark negotiated prior to the North African landings last November were disaffected Vichyites, but in the interview printed below, General Mast, the chief French participant and a De Gaullist, reveals almost casually, with no idea of proving a point or making an exposé, that De Gaullists played a major role in preparing the way for the Anglo-American expedition. This throws a curious and sinister light on the many inspired reports that De Gaulle had no influence in Algeria and gives the interview more significance than either General Mast or Mr. Clark imagined.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Beirut, Syria, May 28

GENERAL MAST, recently appointed Resident General of Tunisia by General Giraud, is recovering in a Beirut military hospital from injuries suffered in an airplane accident. His appointment brings to the fore a man who, perhaps more than anyone else, was responsible for preparing the way in North Africa for the Allied landings in November, 1942. Having obtained General Mast's permission to interview him on behalf of The Nation, I had the good fortune to hear his first-hand account of the dramatic conspiracy which preceded and made possible the Anglo-American operations.

Receiving me in his hospital room overlooking St. George's Bay, with a view, beyond, of the snow-capped mountains of the Lebanon, General Mast began by stressing that genuine unity of all Frenchmen in the war was inevitable.

"There is no real problem of unity," he said. "From a military point of view it is already a fact. In Tunisia, for instance, French soldiers of the North African army and those of Fighting France, having campaigned side by side, are now fraternizing without any feeling of difference. Political unity, which is essential to give France a government truly representing the nation, cannot lag far behind: too many forces combine to bring it about. Even the problems of organization, which so far have been a delaying factor, can hardly prevent an outcome to which both General Giraud and General de Gaulle are pledged and which is the will of the French people.

"I presume that the story of the French conspiracy in North Africa preceding the Allied landings is known in America. It was a dramatic episode, filled with tense moments when the success or failure of the whole enterprise hung in the balance, an episode of which the smallest detail will never be forgotten by us who took part in it.

"The news of General Giraud's escape from the Königstein Fortress in Germany, which might be considered the first step in our conspiracy, was flashed around the world. But each of the steps which followed, during long months of planning and preparation, was necessarily surrounded by the strictest secrecy. General Giraud's decision to take upon himself the responsibility for organizing French resistance in North Africa, a decision from which General Weygand had recoiled, and my arrival in Algiers shortly afterward as his advance agent were the real beginnings of our conspiracy.

"In North Africa I found the American mission headed by Mr. Murphy, upon which all our hopes hung, virtually quarantined by General Weygand, who had ordered all officers under his command to refrain from having any dealings whatever with American diplomatic or consular personnel. General Weygand refused from the start to listen to proposals of Allied military aid in North Africa, and all reports to the contrary are untrue. At this moment French officers who took a lead in conversations with Mr. Murphy and his associates languish in Vichy prisons, sentenced by General Weygand.

"Realizing that the arrival in North Africa of an American military expedition of any importance—and only an important one would do—could be brought about only through direct contact with the American General Staff, I begged Mr. Murphy, with whom I was secretly in touch, to do his utmost to arrange a meeting between myself and an American general somewhere along the North African coast. Mr. Murphy agreed to do his best, but his inopportune absence from North Africa during September and early October delayed this meeting so vitally important to our two countries. When Mr. Murphy returned to Algiers, however, it was possible to put the plan into execution. In touch with London by radio, Mr. Murphy managed to arrange for General Clark and his staff to be brought to Gibraltar in a Flying Fortress belonging to the R. A. F. and from Gibraltar to the North African coast, on October 22, in a British submarine.

"The meeting took place near the town of Cherchell, in a farmhouse close to the shore.* General Clark and his staff landed on the deserted beach before dawn from the submarine hovering offshore. The beach was guarded; but the coastguardsmen there were among the dozen or so men in North Africa who were in the plot. As soon as General Clark came ashore, he went into conference with Mr. Murphy and myself; while we three studied the general aspects of the problem, the officers of General Clark's staff and the French officers who had accompanied me worked out its details. On that day the plan of an Allied landing took shape, and backed by General Clark's pledge of a full-scale American operation, we decided to lose no time in putting the affair up to General Giraud, who was still in France.

"The day was not without its alarms. A native, unseen by the guard, had witnessed the landing of the American officers, and suspecting that something serious was afoot, had hastened to Cherchell to inform the police commissioner there of what he had seen. Fortunately he was conducted first, not to the commissioner himself, but to the vice-commissioner, who by a singular chance belonged to our group and knew of the meeting. The vice-commissioner did everything in his power to keep the native and his story from reaching the commissioner, but toward evening the commissioner's suspicions were aroused. He determined to go to the farm and investigate for himself. At that moment our enterprise hung by a thread; it was saved only by the coolness of the lieutenant commanding the coastguardsmen. This officer was the first person to see the commissioner arrive. Asked by the commissioner what was going on in the farmhouse, he replied that the American envoy, Mr. Murphy, had chosen this out-of-the-way spot to give a rather riotous party for some of his friends, and that it would not be wise to disturb him, since to do so might create a diplomatic incident. The commissioner retired, General Clark and his officers came up from the cellar where they had taken refuge, and the conference was resumed.

"Our troubles did not end there, however. At nightfall, when the time came for General Clark to return to the submarine, it was discovered that the sea, which in the morning had been quite calm, was now running high, with dangerous breakers near the shore. The waves made the use of the landing craft, which were nothing more than kayaks, extremely perilous. These frail boats, when put into the water, upset almost at once; and yet a postponement of the departure was out of the question. Several hours passed. At last, toward four o'clock, General Clark decided to put off in spite of the sea, which had not grown less angry; dawn was about to break and it would have been folly to wait any longer. We held our breath as we watched the operation. The little kayaks were badly tossed about but by some miracle reached the submarine before they capsized. Luckily the General and his staff were dragged from the water, drenched but safe.

"In the following days our conspiracy matured, and the measure of its success could be seen on the night of November 7, the night preceding the Allied landings. Although in Morocco and at Oran our plans, for various fortuitous reasons, miscarried, in Algiers they succeeded perfectly. The groups of resistance which I had organized there, and which were composed exclusively of civilians, the majority of them partisans of General de Gaulle, took over the city before dawn; they made virtual prisoners of all pro-Vichy leaders, including Darlan; and they saw to it that the Anglo-American forces were able to occupy the place almost without firing a shot."

GERALD L. K. SMITH is growing more tolerant. He opened a recent meeting of his Committee of One Million in Cleveland with the announcement that they would say the Lord's Prayer in unison. "We want you all to rise," he said, "whether you are Catholic or Methodist."

IF YOU DOUBT Franco's neutrality, your doubts should be removed by the background material which the Press Association, radio division of the Associated Press, has sent to its member stations. "Up to now," it reads, "the Spanish generalissimo has maintained a foreign policy of non-belligerency. But at the same time he has maintained a token division on the Russian front—the only military aid he is known to have given either Hitler or Mussolini. . . . His sole token of disrespect against the Anglo-American powers is his denunciation of Soviet Russia as a menace to Europe."

ALL THE PEOPLE ALL THE TIME: An article in Printers' Ink tells how the advertising manager can make the workers love the company: "The advertising manager who spends a little time in the plant quickly learns the potential power of the underground 'grapevine' in the plant. He will make friends of certain people who are active contributors to the grapevine, and on occasion, to serve the company's interest, he will very confidentially drop a message into this grapevine operator's eager ear. He will know enough, of course, not to try to use this expedient too often."

FESTUNG EUROPA: An official German circular gives these instructions for dealing with foreign workers: "Keep your distance. No friendly words, only commands. . . . Though it is difficult for the German people, they must learn that the too soft German heart must be second to common sense." . . . At an Oslo restaurant a Nazi officer asked a young lady to dance with him. She refused. "Is it because I am a German?" "By no means. It is because I am a Norwegian."

POLITICAL WAR

EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

"Order" in Europe

AFTER three years of discreet reserve the Vatican has again emerged into world politics. Its first political proclamation was the speech by Pope Pius XII to 25,000 Italian workers, commented upon briefly in this section last week. All its previous utterances had been at best escapes from earth to heaven. As long as fascism was strong and a fascist victory probable, the Vatican limited itself to the minimum activity required in order to avoid giving the impression that the Catholic church, like the Comintern, had decided to dissolve. It had, of course, expressed its pure unpolitical horror at the sufferings to which mankind had been subjected. But at no time had the Holy See considered it its duty to mention the anti-Christ by name or to declare Hitler outside the law of God.

Moving into the victorious coalition, the Vatican takes the position that might have been expected. It sides immediately with the faction that survived Munich, remained in power after war came, and is now all out to ruin the peace. The diplomacy of expediency, of a "fascism without Mussolini," of the formula "Don Juan with or without Franco," of collaboration with the Latin American dictators finds in Pius XII its best support. But neither the tradition of the Vatican nor the strong personality of its present head can reconcile itself to the idea of being on the losing side. That is perhaps the most disquieting aspect of the Pope's speech. The fact that His Holiness has pronounced himself publicly in favor of a policy of suppression of the people's will would indicate a conviction on his part that this is the policy already decided on in certain capitals of the United Nations. What part the peregrinations of Archbishop Spellman may have played in forming this judgment belongs to the mystery that still surrounds that most interesting mission.

In his paternal advice to the underground to behave with moderation and not to follow false leaders the Pope reveals the chief objective of Vatican policy—to limit the action of the forces of resistance. The underground is all right as an auxiliary of the military occupation. While the armies of liberation are landing and in the first encounters with the enemy, the underground can render necessary services, but it should by no means claim the right to outlive its usefulness. As soon as the military men have the situation in hand, the underground votes thanks for their arrival—and disappears.

In some degree this has been the spirit in which the officials of the United Nations, from the beginning, have approached the underground. It has been looked upon as a valuable adjunct to the intelligence services and as a vehicle for anti-Axis propaganda, never as the political expression of the reawakening of the people. The Pope knows better. He sees in the underground an irreconcilable enemy of fascism, hostile to any intermediate situation, ready to make good the Roosevelt promise to liquidate all forms of "totalitarian tyranny." Recognizing the important part played by the Catholic masses in the underground, His Holiness now tries to draw them out of a dangerous alliance which tomorrow may defy even the efforts of the United Nations to prevent things in Europe from swinging too far to the left.

Reaction has found its slogan: "Order and discipline must preside over the peace." It is not a new one. The statesmen gathered at the Congress of Vienna repeated the same words to one another in the decisive sessions, and they repeated them to their mistresses when those intriguing ladies, through their flirtations, threatened to disrupt the harmony among the powers shaping the Holy Alliance. The slogan is not new. The only things new today are the situation that faces us and the technique that promises to be applied to it. The situation has a potential explosiveness corresponding to the sufferings the people have had to endure. In the occupied countries each village is a powder keg. Hate is not directed simply against the invader. It extends, perhaps with even greater virulence, against those who have collaborated with the invader, whether from conviction or fear. That, on the local level. On the national level we find the entire people eager to rebuild the country, but to rebuild it according to political, economic, and social patterns different from those which produced the collapse.

Everyone knows that his present misery is due to fascism. But the record of weakness toward the aggressors, of temporizing with the dictators, of internal corruption, of unlimited domination by big business—this has not been forgotten either. Europe is in suspense, awaiting a profound change, a change of centuries in its way of life. Wise friends advise us not to frighten the people in this country with the word "revolution." Let us be amiable. Let us use a less alarming expression and call it "elimination of obstacles." What nobody can dispute is that the peoples of Europe are ready to rise. They may astonish the rest of the world by their vitality.

Now about the technique. If one is to judge by the methods so far used, the reactionaries totally misunderstand the spirit of peoples which have been subjected for years to fascist domination. They apparently believe that a combination of a strong hand and gentleness, of occupation armies followed by shipments of food, will be all that is necessary to control the masses according to plan. There is something pathetic in the enthusiasm and noble eagerness with which thousands of Americans are preparing to serve as administrators for the United Nations. A good number of them come from the universities, or the liberal professions. They have had hardly more political experience than what they have gained by voting in the elections and participating in the enviable comforts of American democratic life. Few have had any direct contact with labor. Few have seen a crowd of desperate men and women enraged by humiliations, injustice, and persecution. They do not know what a country is like which knows it has been betrayed. One can imagine one of these future administrators solemnly performing his duties in Marseilles when the French men and women have gone into the streets to get the Vichyites—the good preacher of democracy, trained for sober functions of government, trying to hold back the mob! His role will be pathetic unless behind him stands someone who is ready, in the name of freedom, to give the order to fire. And that would be worse.

If the war had been understood from the beginning as a war against fascism, the approach to the problem of maintaining order would have been quite different. Many mistakes and contradictions which may well prevent the heads of the United Nations from exercising moral authority in Europe would have been avoided. Had the war been conceived of as a struggle against fascism, no one would have thought of reproaching General de Gaulle for his insistence on removing fascist-minded officers from the French army in North Africa. His policy would have been the policy of the United Nations. Instead, every success he has achieved in the French Committee of National Liberation has appeared as an American diplomatic defeat, while every American victory, such as was scored last week when De Gaulle was finally forced to yield in his effort to purge the army, becomes an actual defeat for the United Nations. Skepticism about all the pledges of freedom and self-determination must inevitably overwhelm the people of Europe when they see that in North Africa the policy of compromise, of a "negotiated peace" between the fascist and anti-fascist forces, is again having its way.

As the war is being waged in the political field, with reaction growing stronger and stronger every day, with the authority of the United Nations as champions of freedom endangered by their own mistakes, the best thing that can be hoped for is that the masses may be left to settle their own account with fascism and to gather around their chosen leaders.

In any case, in the conflict that threatens to arise between the peoples of Europe determined to change the order existing previous to 1938 and those elements in the United Nations which are set upon salvaging as much as possible of that order, the Vatican hardly seems the best authority to intervene. Its record during recent years—its silence about China and Czechoslovakia and Austria, its belligerency against the people of Spain—has not increased its reputation and influence among the free men of Europe. Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AMONG the German troops in Tunisia was the 334th infantry division. Its commander was a Major General Eder. On April 18, when the final struggle had begun but had not yet reached its climax, General Eder issued to his officers an order which may be considered a historical document. The text, with other papers from divisional headquarters, fell into the hands of the English. It is of interest for the light it throws on the German collapse.

The General's order affirmed that in recent days officers and non-commissioned officers had repeatedly urged their men to throw down their weapons and allow themselves to be taken prisoner. They had done this even when the situation was "as yet in no way hopeless." Those officers should not imagine that because they are prisoners they will escape the consequences of such "disgraceful behavior." "The severest consequences will be experienced by their families now and by them personally after the war." The order enjoined all commanders to keep a watchful eye out for any sign of cowardice or neglect of duty in officers and non-coms, and if they discovered anything of the kind, to proceed against it "with the most extreme brutality."

The picture of demoralization that emerges from this order explains much that happened later. When the central authorities at Berlin learned of such proceedings in Tunisia, they must have been seized by panic, for three days after the order was issued they acted with what may be in truth described as "extreme brutality," though perhaps the brutality was not actually as great as it seems. The Reichsgesetzblatt of April 21 promulgated a law that with a stroke of the pen removed all limitations on military punishments and empowered the military courts to impose any penalty they chose.

> Against persons subject to the military penal code who are guilty of an offense against military discipline or against the postulates of military courage, penalties more severe than those prescribed by existing laws may be imposed, including forced labor for life or the death penalty, if this is deemed necessary to maintain discipline or insure the safety of the troops.

> The same applies to offenses which particularly prejudice the conduct of the war or the security of the Reich, if according to sound popular belief the legal penalties are not sufficient punishment for the deed.

It is hard to understand what the war lords had in mind when they issued this singular decree. "Cowardice in the face of the enemy" was the worst of all crimes in the regular military code and was punishable with death. The law could not be made more severe. In any case, the hasty attempt to check the demoralization that was setting in on the Tunisian battlefields by means of super-draconian threats availed nothing.

The discomforts resulting from the scarcity of household goods in Germany are illustrated by an order issued by the Burgomaster of Stuttgart in the second week of June. In spite of the shortage of lodgings, the order said, an increasing number of rooms in hotels and boarding houses are unrented. According to the proprietors, the reason is their inability to supply bed linen for these rooms. Nevertheless, the Burgomaster continued, from now on every bed must be rented. If there is no bed linen, table linen must be used. When that is gone, the guests must be told to bring their own sheets—in which case 10 per cent shall be taken off the regular price of the room.

For the last four months the city of Königsberg in Prussia has had a barter shop, the first in Germany. And according to the D. N. B. report, it has had great success. Used articles which can no longer be found in stores are brought to the shop and exchanged for other articles elsewhere unobtainable. An unneeded flatiron, for instance, is exchanged for a saucepan, or a carpet for a mattress. The value of the various articles is appraised by merchandising experts at the shop. Only the difference in the worth of two things exchanged, plus a fee for the service, is paid in cash. In the four months since the shop was established 4,500 transactions have been concluded.

The Spanish Trade System

THE final computation of the value of Spanish trade in 1942 shows a credit of 16,500,000 gold pesetas. This compares with 1941's deficit of 35,000,000 gold pesetas. Official circles consider the change a sign of the tremendous success of the Spanish trade system. Argentina was the biggest exporter to Spain in 1941, but in 1942 Germany took first place. Spain's imports from Germany increased in value from 51,000,000 to 117,000,000 gold pesetas. Germany is still the biggest purchaser of Spain's exports, although its own exports to Spain have decreased slightly this year.—Berlin short-wave broadcast to North America.

Not Peace but a Sword

A woman who identified herself as an Indian spoke to India on the Rome radio on June 20 and interpreted General Wavell's appointment as Viceroy as a sign that India "has become too hot for the British." She said: "Prepare to forget the doctrine of non-violence which for so many years has made eunuchs and women of you. Today England, to keep you in subjection, puts a man of the sword on India's throne. You, my brothers, get rid of the spinning-wheel that has made you like women, and grasp the sword."

The same broadcast carried a Domei account of an interview in Tokyo with Subhas Chandra Bose, former Indian Congress Party leader, who has heretofore done his propagandizing from Berlin. Bose was quoted as saying that "civil disobedience cannot of itself expel the British government, which is supported by bayonets. We also must make use of bayonets." He "praised Hitler and Mussolini" for aiding Indian nationalists, Rome reported, and "stated that Tojo takes a deep interest in India."—C. B. S. short-wave listening station.

Although many workers in the west [of Germany] do not have beds of their own any longer, and have to find some sort of makeshift arrangement for getting their sleep, work is continuing. The wives of these workers are no longer able to prepare the meals for their families in their own kitchens. They eat in community kitchens, but work is continuing. Many shopkeepers have been bombed out, and wares are now sold in the open or are distributed by the party. The main thing, however, is that work is continuing. At night the inhabitants of the Ruhr spend many hours in their cellars while British and American bombers are circling overhead. After the raid is over, they put out the fires, dig up any neighbors who may be buried under the ruins of their houses, and clean up the streets. Next morning work is resumed as usual. That is the Battle of the Ruhr.—Berlin short-wave broadcast to Asia.

Axis Paradise

We in Axis countries are not wasting the energies of the nation with petty follies. We have no presidential or other elections; we have no personal ambitions of so-called political leaders; we have no party squabbles to sap the stamina of the country. We have no working classes which must fight against capitalist exploitation in order to obtain halfway decent living conditions. Our workers are not compelled to live in slums and are not forced to join anti-God leagues as they are in the Bolshevist paradise. The greatest psychological mistake made by our enemies is the so-called war of nerves. Threats do not work, and the accompanying bombing raids against our civilian population have aroused hatred and contempt for the enemy. As for the promises, every Italian remembers what happened to a victorious Italy after the last war. Every Italian knows that the promises made so lavishly at that time were never kept by the nations which were Italy's allies then and are its enemies today. He knows that if that happened to a victorious Italy, a defeated Italy would fare still worse.—Rome short-wave broadcast to England.

BOOKS and the ARTS

GRAHAM GREENE

BY MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

THERE was something about a fête which drew Arthur Rowe irresistibly . . . called him like innocence." We meet him in blitzed and gutted London, stumbling on a charity bazaar in a Bloomsbury square, a man alone and a murderer, but fearless because he has made a friend of his guilt: when he gave his wife the poison that released her from the suffering he pitied he did not ask her consent; "he could never tell whether she might not have preferred any sort of life to death." A fortune-teller slips him, mistakenly, the password by which he wins a cake in the bazaar's raffle. But there are others who want it and the thing concealed in its heart. Visited that night in his shabby room by a cripple, Rowe has barely tasted the hyoscine in his tea when out of a droning sky a bomb drops, explodes the house, and blows him and us into a dream of horrors—man-hunt, spies, sabotage, amnesia, murders, and suicides: the latest "entertainment" of Graham Greene.

We enter the familiar phantasm of our age, and Greene's expert evocation of it through eleven novels—of which "The Ministry of Fear" is the latest*—has justly won him the title of "the Auden of the modern thriller." Here again is the haunted England of l'entre deux guerres, the European nightmare of corruption and doom, a Blick ins Chaos where > taut with apprehensive dreads

> The sleepless guests of Europe lay
> Wishing the centuries away,
> And the low mutter of their vows
> Went echoing through her haunted house,
> As on the verge of happening
> There crouched the presence of The Thing.

The fustian stage sets of Oppenheim, Chambers, and Wallace are gone with their earlier innocent day. We are in a cosmos whose fabulous realities have terribly condensed out of contemporary legend and prophecy—the portentous journalism of Tabouis, Thompson, Sheean, Gunther, and the apotheosis of foreign correspondence; the films of Lang, Murnau, Renoir, and Hitchcock; the Gothic fables of Ambler, Hammett, and Simenon; the putsches, pogroms, marches, and mobilizations that have mounted to catastrophe in the present moment of our lives. Its synthetic thrills and archaic brutality are ruses of melodrama no longer. Guilt pervades all life; all of us are trying to discover how we entered the nightmare, by what treachery we were betrayed to the howling storm of history. "Mother, please listen to me," cries Rowe to a mother who is dead; "I've killed my wife and the police want me." . . . "My little boy couldn't kill anyone":

> His mother smiled at him in a scared way but let him talk: he was the master of the dream now. He said, "I'm wanted for a murder I didn't do. People want to kill me because I know too much. I'm hiding underground, and up above the Germans are methodically smashing London to bits all round me. You remember St. Clements—the bells of St. Clements. They've smashed that—St. James's Piccadilly, the Burlington Arcade, Garland's Hotel where we stayed for the pantomime, Maples, and John Lewis. It sounds like a thriller, doesn't it?—but the thrillers are like life . . . it's what we've all made of the world since you died. I'm your little Arthur who wouldn't hurt a beetle and I'm a murderer too. The world has been remade by William Le Queux."

Every age has its aesthetic of crime and horror, its attempt to give form to its special psychic or neurotic climate. No age has imposed greater handicaps on the effort than ours. Crime has gone beyond Addison's "chink in the armor" of civilized society; it has become the symptom of a radical lesion in the stamina of humanity. The hot violence of the Elizabethans is as different from the cold brutality of Hitlerian Europe, the heroic sin in Aeschylus or Webster from the squalid and endemic degeneracy in Céline or Miller, the universal proportions of Greek or Shakespearean wrong from the calculating gratuity of Gide's aesthetic murderers, as the worth at which the individual life was held in those times from its worthlessness in ours. A criminal takes his dignity from his defiance of the intelligence or merit that surrounds him, from the test his act imposes on the human community. He becomes trivial when that measure is denied him. So the modern thriller is permitted its prodigies of contrivance and holocausts of death at the cost of becoming a bore. So movie audiences fidget restlessly through "Desert Victory," waiting to be overwhelmed by the edifying bilge of "Random Harvest." The thrill-habit, fed by novels, newsreels, and events, has competed successfully with gin, drugs, and aspirin, and doped the moral nerve of a generation.

The hardship this imposes on the artist is obvious. When felony, by becoming political, becomes impersonal; when the acte gratuit elicits not only secret but public heroism, its dramatist faces the baffling task of restoring to his readers their lost instinct of values, the sense of human worth. It is not enough that the thriller become psychic: Freudian behavior patterns have become as much an open commodity and stock property as spy rings and torture chambers were a generation ago. It must become moral as well.

The Victorian frisson of crime was all the choicer for the rigor of propriety and sentiment that hedged it in. Dickens's terrors are enhanced less by his rhetoric than by his coziness. The reversion to criminality in Dostoevski takes place in a ramifying hierarchy of authority—family life, social caste, political and religious bureaucracy, czarist militarism and repression. The horror of "The Turn of the Screw" is framed by the severest decorum, taste, and inhibition. James—like Conrad, Gide, and Mann—knew the enchantment of crime, but he also knew its artistic conditions. "Everything you may further do will be grist to my imaginative mill," he wrote

William Roughead in thanks for a book of the latter's criminal histories: "I'm not sure I enter into such matters best when they are very archaic or remote from our familiarities, for then the testimony to manners and morals is rather blurred for me by the whole barbarism. . . . The thrilling in the comparatively modern much appeals to me—for there the special manners and morals become queerly disclosed. . . . Then do go back to the dear old human and sociable murders and adulteries and forgeries in which we are so agreeably at home." The admonition might have served as the cue for Graham Greene's talent.

Greene, facing a "whole barbarism" equal to anything in history, has undertaken to redeem that dilapidation from the stupefying mechanism and inconsequence to which modern terrorism has reduced it. Arthur Calder-Marshall has rightly said in Horizon that "few living English novelists derive more material from the daily newspaper than Graham Greene." His mise-en-scène includes the Nazi underground and fifth column ("The Confidential Agent," "The Ministry of Fear"), organized Marxism torn by schisms and betrayals ("It's a Battlefield"), Kruger ("England Made Me"), Zaharoff ("This Gun for Hire"), the English race-track gangs ("Brighton Rock"), the Mexican church suppression ("The Labyrinthine Ways"), and his "Orient Express" is the same train we've traveled on from "Shanghai Express" to "Night Train" and "The Lady Vanishes." But where once —in James, Conrad, Dostoevski, Dickens, Defoe, or the Elizabethans—it was society, state, kingdom, world, or the universe itself that supplied the presiding order of law or justice, it is now the isolated, betrayed, and indestructible integrity of the individual life that furnishes that measure. Humanity, having contrived a world of mindless and psychotic brutality, reverts to the atom of the lonely man. Marked, hunted, Ishmaelite, or condemned, he may work for evil or for good, but it is his passion for moral identity that provides the nexus of values in a world that has reverted to anarchy. His lineage is familiar—Raskolnikov, Stavrogin, Mitya; Conrad's Jim, Heyst, and Razumov; Mann's Krull and Gide's Lafcadio; Hesse's Steppenwolf and, immediately, Kafka's K. He appears in every Greene novel—as hero in Drover, Dr. Czinner, the nameless D.; as pariah or renegade in Raven, Farrant, Rowe, and the whiskey priest of "The Labyrinthine Ways"; as the incarnation of pure malevolence in Pinkie, the boy gangster and murderer of "Brighton Rock."

The plot that involves him is fairly constant; "Brighton Rock" presents it in archetype. Its conflict rests on a basic dualism, saved from mere mechanism by Greene's fertility in invention and complex insight, but radical in its antithesis of forces. Pinkie is a believing Catholic, knows hell as a reality, and accepts his damnation; corruptio optimi pessima is the last faith left him to live or die by. Ida Arnold, the full-blown, life-loving tart whose casual lover the gang has killed, sets out to track him down: "unregenerate, a specimen of the 'natural man,' coarsely amiable, bestially kind, the most dangerous enemy to religion." She pursues him with ruthless and deadly intention, corners him, sees him killed. The boy is sped to his damnation and Ida triumphs. ("God doesn't mind a bit of human nature. . . . I know the difference between Right and Wrong.") The hostility is crucial; it appears in all Greene's mature books—Mather the detective against Raven the assassin ("This Gun for Hire"), the Inspector against Drover ("It's a Battlefield"), the Communist lieutenant of police, accompanied by the mestizo who acts as nemesis, against the hunted, shameless, renegade priest in "The Labyrinthine Ways," trailing his desecrated sanctity through the hovels and jungles of the Mexican state, yet persisting in his office of grace and so embracing the doom that pursues him. A recent critic in the New Statesman put the case clearly: "Mr. Greene is a Catholic, and his novel 'Brighton Rock' betrays a misanthropic, almost Jansenist, contempt for the virtues that do not spring from grace."

It is this grace that operates as the instrument which makes palpable its necessary enemy, Evil—and it is by the evil that materializes out of vice, crime, and nightmare in his books that Greene joins a distinguished company: the same evil works behind the psychic riddle in "The Turn of the Screw" and behind the squalid violence of Conrad's "The Secret Agent," that parent classic in this field of fiction, which appeared in 1907 and established the kind of novel that Greene and his generation have carried to such exorbitant lengths. To fix and objectify it, to extricate it from the relativity of abstractions—abstract justice, impersonal humanitarianism, pity, right and wrong, good and bad—is the ulterior motive of Greene's work. His pursuit of it carried him among the totems and horrors of coastal Africa, which he conjures in "Journey Without Maps"—his descent to the heart of darkness:

> It isn't a gain to have turned the witch or the masked secret dancer, the sense of supernatural evil, into the small human viciousness of the thin distinguished military gray head in Kensington Gardens with the soft lips and the eye which dwelt with dull luster on girls and boys of a certain age. . . . They are not, after all, so far from the central darkness. . . . When one sees to what unhappiness, to what peril of extinction centuries of cerebration have brought us, one sometimes has a curiosity to discover if one can from what we have come, to recall at which point we went astray.

> So far as we are human, what we do must be either evil or good; so far as we do evil or good we are human; and it is better, in a paradoxical way, to do evil than to do nothing: at least, we exist. It is true to say that the glory of man is his capacity for salvation; it is also true to say that his glory is his capacity for damnation. The worst that can be said of most of our malefactors, from statesmen to thieves, is that they are not men enough to be damned.)

Greene's progress in his task has not escaped the pitfalls of his compromise with popularity. His expert contrivance often descends to sleight-of-hand; the surrealism of his action and atmosphere easily results in efflorescences of sheer conjuring; the machinery of the thriller—chases, coincidences, exploding surprises—can collapse into demented catastrophe. And Greene drives his philosophical ambition hard. His plots flirt with absolutes—a kind of moral vis inertiae—of social and emotional realities that reappear in the stock humors to which his characters and their psychic pathology often reduce. His great gifts in dialogue, characterization, marginal commentary, and hallucinated scenery run frequently to exorbitance through the uncanny facility which is the danger of his special kind of brilliance.

But there is no question that a major purpose works behind his popular or cinematic effects. He uses horror for what it has signified in every age—Elizabethan, Gothic, romantic, or Victorian—as a medium for exploring the evasions, fears, and regressive panic that may drag us back from the ascendancy of reason or pride to infantilism and brutality, but must always, in any age, be met and faced if salvation is to miss the curse of presumption. "The abyss destroys; the abyss exalts; descend that you may be saved. The enemy we conquer is the enemy we embrace and love." The identity Greene's heroes pursue is the selfhood of a conscience implicated in the full mystery and terror of their natures; if the "destructive element" engulfs them, it is their resisting passion for a spiritual destiny that stains and brightens the flood. And it is because he sustains a dialectic between the oblivion of naturalism and the absolute tests of moral selfhood that Greene has brought about one of the most promising collaborations between realism and spirituality that have recently appeared in fiction, saving his work as much from the squashy hocus-pocus or mechanical contrivance of the common thriller as from the didactic sanctimony of conventional religiosity. In at least three of his books—"It's a Battlefield," "Brighton Rock," and "The Labyrinthine Ways"—he may claim the ancestry of James, Conrad, and Joyce, and the company of men like Kafka, Auden, and Mauriac. He stands at the threshold of major fiction, a searching, irresistible talent, and a true magician in the words and spells of authentic drama. He has found an instrument for probing the temper and tragedy of his age, the perversions and fears that have betrayed it, and the stricken weathers of its soul. It only remains for him to surmount its distractions and negative appeals more decisively to stand unrivaled as a novelist in the English generation to which history and his high gift of consciousness have committed him.

Architecture of Brazil

BRAZIL BUILDS: ARCHITECTURE NEW AND OLD, 1652-1942. By Philip L. Goodwin. Photographs by G. E. Kidder Smith. The Museum of Modern Art. $5.

AROUND 1930 Frank Lloyd Wright came back from Brazil speaking so extravagantly of Rio de Janeiro that no one paid much attention to him. In 1936 Le Corbusier was there, frankly fascinated by its problems and its possibilities. Lately people who listen to such interpreters of pan-American culture as Domingo Santa Cruz and Henríquez Ureña might have noted, without understanding it, the opinion that "in exploring the possibilities of the city and its architecture Brazil has gone even farther than North America." Now at last the Museum of Modern Art has made it possible for the average citizen to see what Brazil is building, and to judge what contribution it makes to "American" architecture.

A book on architecture is always more than a mere technical or aesthetic study; it is the evidence for cultural history. You can look at a square in Rio de Janeiro and read the story of Brazil, as a geologist reads the history of a mountain from its exposed strata. First came the Portuguese, bringing the long Mediterranean tradition, with its exotic overtones of Eastern empire. Thanks to them, Brazil can show a store of colonial architecture of extraordinary splendor and variety. Then there was Paris, the new Athens, which deposited opera house and presidential palace in the nineteenth century. And finally—always slower than one would expect—a new wind blowing down the continent brings a new architecture. For North Americans the interesting fact about this history is its similarity to our own. We have been hardly less colonial than the Brazilians, and the cultural succession of the mother-country, the classical tradition, nineteenth-century France, and finally the German and French reformers in architecture is unanimous.

What we like to think of as the American spirit, however, is an independent, creative experimentation with the possibilities of solving any particular problem. Not necessarily anti-traditional, a New World should yet take nothing for granted, seeking not novelty for its own sake but new forms, suitable to new materials, for new purposes. It is from this point of view that the new architecture in Brazil is striking. Rio de Janeiro, in its setting of fantastic beauty, is like no other city in the world. It has no frosts and no earthquakes; there is a fairly predictable rainfall; winds and breezes are pretty regular; and there is an intense tropical sun, whose angle is all but invariable. The enthusiasm and inventiveness with which the architects of Brazil have dealt with this particular set of conditions cannot be too highly praised. Their outdoor rooms and roofed gardens, the blank walls to the sun and free glass on the shady side, the galleries and loggias and open stairways are not merely handsome; they are comfortable. Two examples of this ingenuity stand out: the devices for interrupting direct sunlight—particularly on the Ministry of Education and Health or the Brazilian Press Building—and the Raul Vidal school at Niteroi, stilted up to leave the view and breeze open, with shaded passages and playgrounds below. For such achievements as these, one feels, not only reinforced concrete but the mind of man itself was intended.

It is only just to balance this enthusiasm by the observation that most of Brazil is still badly housed, that most of the country is without schools or hospitals of any sort, and that outside the few cities represented here functionalism has hardly been heard of. In short, the architects are ahead of the social planners; they ought to be set to work on small hospitals for provincial towns, day nurseries, community centers, and subsistence housing for the people who now live between banana thatch and bamboo floor. Brazil needs all these things desperately, needs them rather more than casinos and hotels. Looking at the new Ministry of Education and Health, however, one expects Brazil to proceed to these problems: one cannot but have faith in a country which produces such a public building instead of a Roman temple.

The fact that this is the first book in the three hundred years of our common history to give North Americans an idea of Brazilian architecture would, in itself, make this volume impressive. Here is the tangible evidence that there are other Americas worthy of our curiosity and our interest. Tables of statistics, anecdotes of travel, and the opinions of philosophers are all very well; but here you can see it with your own eyes. The Museum of Modern Art, Philip Goodwin, and Kidder Smith cannot be too warmly commended for the job they have done. Typographically, clarity has been somewhat sacrificed to a graceful solution of the bilingual problem—one finds oneself reading on through the English into the Portuguese repetition of the text. The text, to be sure, is on the shallow side, especially the historical section, which offers little to clarify our ignorance of Portuguese styles and terminology. But the photographs are of permanent value—well chosen, interesting in detail, and technically excellent. Once again the museum has demonstrated that a catalogue can be made both useful to the expert and a pleasure to the casual. To those of us who are interested in the other Americas it is a model of what might be done for every country below the Rio Grande.

The Confederate Command

LEE'S LIEUTENANTS: A STUDY IN COMMAND. Volume II: CEDAR MOUNTAIN TO CHANCELLORSVILLE. By Douglas Southall Freeman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

DR. FREEMAN'S promised three volumes seem likely to become at least four, for in 712 pages he carries his story forward only ten months. In order to achieve his purpose of describing the deeds and weighing the military worth of Lee's principal subordinates he has found it impossible to avoid rewriting the history of the Army of Northern Virginia. But no student of the Civil War will complain, for if Dr. Freeman covers old ground he views it from a new angle and with a fresh eye. And while his treatment is minutely detailed, the weight of his scholarship is lightened by consistent good writing and a sense of humor.

In this volume Stonewall Jackson is again the outstanding figure. He was no longer conducting a semi-independent command but operating directly under the eye of Lee and proving that he could "work in harness." His judgment was not, Dr. Freeman shows, always unerring, but he grew in military stature up to the fatal moment in the Wilderness. His chief deficiency was in tact—a common failing among generals—and all Lee's firm diplomacy was needed to handle the long feud between him and Powell Hill. Dr. Freeman's account of this squabble is both full and fair.

After Jackson the most noteworthy of the leaders are perhaps Longstreet, Stuart, and Early, whose rising reputations we follow in this volume. But we are introduced, in addition, to a host of officers high and low, some of whom failed, and faded out of the picture, while others advanced rapidly to greater and greater responsibility. Constant attrition of the officer corps made for speedy promotion. After each great battle the commander-in-chief had the heavy task of finding new heads for divisions and brigades—a task made the more burdensome because he had to take into account state and professional rivalries as well as military qualities. After Sharpsburg, where three generals were killed and five incapacitated, there was "a crisis in command" which was solved with difficulty and only partial success. A few months later, when the Wilderness had taken its toll, the crisis was renewed, and in Dr. Freeman's words, "the end of the file was reached. . . . The school of combat did not graduate enough men to make good the casualties of instruction. Command, which had always been an adventure, became after Chancellorsville a gamble against lengthening odds." One wonders whether the Wehrmacht's very heavy losses in general officers during the past year are posing the same problem to the German high command.

The one serious complaint to be made against Dr. Freeman's work concerns its maps. True, there are plenty of them, but they might well have been fewer and better. For instance, there are as many as eleven illustrating various phases of the battles around Chancellorsville but none which makes clear the whole campaign and the relation of the different "fronts" to each other. In too many cases the maps give little or no information about the physical nature of the terrain and omit topographical features which are mentioned in the text as strategically significant. We can agree that the mapping of anything as fluid as a battle presents a difficult problem. Any attempt to show the disposition of troops must necessarily be a snapshot picturing merely one moment. But for this very reason the reader needs a really detailed map of the ground so that he can trace for himself the moves and counter-moves. KEITH HUTCHISON

Tomorrow's Problems

ECONOMIC FREEDOM: A DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM. By Charles E. Noyes. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE author of this book puts his finger on the burning problems of tomorrow and gets his finger slightly burned. He gives the impression of some awareness of discomfort, coupled with an admirable self-sacrifice and even bravery in coming out frankly with the most unpopular truths when he finds it necessary, as when he points out that any serious improvement in our distribution of income must come not from the very rich but from the comfortable middle classes. Even though fascinated by the efficiencies and advantages of planning, he warns against its dangers and makes abundantly clear that it is but a means for greater efficiency that can only too easily become an end in itself. He is concerned about the dangers of too great a centralization of authority and makes an earnest and convincing plea for greater interest in local government as an education essential for the fruitful working of real democracy.

He touches on all the most disturbing problems—the relation between free enterprise and democracy, the problems of money and credit, of private and public debt, of saving and investment, of management and government, and of international economic relations.

Throughout the treatment an economist—and perhaps it was a little unfair to give this book to an economist to review—feels that though the instincts are right the analysis is inadequate and the less general conclusions frequently incorrect. Thus not only is much of the orthodox economics under attack rather out of date, but the criticisms themselves are similarly dated and inconclusive. In combating the more extreme votaries of "sound finance," who would sacrifice prosperity to the principle of balancing the budget, the unwarranted concession is made that flexible prices would render "sound finance" innocuous. Although Mr. Noyes sees that the size of the national debt does not really matter, he concedes that the interest must be paid out of current taxes, not noticing that if the interest is borrowed the only effect is a greater national debt, which does not matter. Yet in spite of such inelegancies in the analysis the conclusions are very close to the "functional finance" that would result from a complete disregard of the traditional inhibitions.

Another example of inadequate analysis is the chapter on The Burden of Private Debt, in which private debt is blamed for all the evil effects of imperfect competition. It is proposed that private investors should be prevented from establishing perpetual claims on society and that this be achieved by enforcing the amortization of all investments in a corporation in, say, twenty years. Although there are good arguments in favor of some such provision—for example, the subjection of reinvestment to the test of the market, or the strengthening of the control by owners over managers—it is hard to see how such a measure would prevent permanent fortunes; rather it would handicap small fortunes as against large ones, which could hire experts to reinvest the released funds. This proposal seems to stem from an inadequate appreciation of the economic functions of capital and interest in a society which is not infinitely rich in capital. A related confusion appears when private enterprise is simultaneously accused of (a) too little investment out of tenderness for the capital values, belonging to the same corporation, that would be destroyed by the new investment, and (b) too much investment because of lack of concern for the capital values of other corporations, in the preservation of which capital values, it is wrongly claimed, society has a vested interest. An attempt to square this circle by a reference to the overbuilding of new war plants with government funds while the conversion of existing plants to war production was resisted raises other serious problems but does not resolve this contradiction.

Throughout the book the economist is irritated by an underestimation of the part played by the price mechanism in the efficient running of the economy and by a continual rejection of economics instead of an attempt to harness it to our social ideals. This is especially conspicuous in the proposal that international trade be handed over to international marketing organizations for the various commodities, with subsidies for imports and exports to enable high-wage countries to compete with low-wage countries. This seems to be based on a failure to see that a free movement of the foreign exchanges performs all these functions without the machinery of subsidies and commodity boards, with its inevitably accompanying political pressures, against which Mr. Noyes himself warns us.

But in spite of all these and many other annoyances, Mr. Noyes's more important conclusions are usually sound. Even though the economist is not satisfied with the economic analysis, in particular missing the urgently needed application of recent developments in the theory of employment and the theory of monopolistic or imperfect competition, and even though the political scientist and the specialist in administration problems may find fault with the way their special fields are treated, there remains the valuable emphasis on the coordination of all these fields; so that, as in the famous mystery of the influence of Marx, the whole is better than the parts. Mr. Noyes is to be commended for a recognition of the fundamental problems, for bravely groping toward their solution—with remarkable success, considering the somewhat unnecessary darkness—and for faithfully following his own precept to approach the problems "with a deep love for the dignity of human beings."

Education on Post-War Problems

WARTIME FACTS AND POSTWAR PROBLEMS. A Study and Discussion Manual. Edited by Evans Clark. The Twentieth Century Fund. 50 cents.

TO DATE most post-war literature has been directed, consciously or unconsciously, to the small group of experts who are already in agreement on major policies. The much larger section of the general public that is most susceptible to isolationist propaganda has been neglected. Yet this is the group that was primarily responsible for the failure of the last peace and bears the closest watching today. It is they who are most in need both of information and of the regimen of orderly thinking on post-war issues. In an effort to meet this need the Twentieth Century Fund has prepared a brief handbook for use by discussion groups. The plan is somewhat novel. A short and rather "popular" summary of the "facts" on such questions as international relations, business, agriculture, labor, finance, health, housing, and education is accompanied by a series of questions designed to provoke thought and discussion and by running references to a comprehensive body of material readily available.

The text is very simply written, but the questions, unfortunately, seem to have been prepared with an eye rather to scholarly comprehensiveness than to the background of any of the groups likely to need such a discussion aid. Except for very superior groups, or groups with extraordinarily able leadership, the result is more likely to be a pooling of ignorance than fruitful discussion. One has the feeling that too many experts were consulted about the preparation of the book, and that the suggestions of all of them were incorporated without regard to the average person's capacity for assimilation. To cite but one example: readers are asked, "What kinds of demands for short- or long-term credit and investment . . . will come from other countries" after the war, and how these can be met? There is no hint of the significance of this question in terms that would mean anything to John Q. Citizen.

If the task of education for the post-war period is to be adequately carried out, materials will obviously have to be prepared for groups at many levels. It is natural that a start should be made at the top, and for groups at this level the Twentieth Century Fund manual will be extremely useful. But the time may be short, and it is to be hoped that someone is at work on a much simpler and more limited handbook for the average adult group. For a few simple truths driven into the minds of tens of thousands of men and women may be vastly more important in affecting post-war policy than a broader understanding limited to a few.

Art Notes

MODERN ARTISTS. At the Matisse Gallery, 41 East Fifty-seventh Street, until July 31.

This is an exhibition of little pictures by big names, little in more than one sense, for very few of these artists are at their best. Almost every well-known name is here. Picasso, Matisse, Modigliani have drawings; there are the familiar "Ascot Race Course" of Dufy and a Pascin water color of three Negroes called "New Orleans"; Laurens shows a conventionally boring female figure, Chagall an ugly crucifixion; Tamayo and Bores illustrate the darkness that is Mexico, while Marie Laurencin indicates the twilight that is hers. There is an interesting Roualt, "Standing Figure," less religious and royal than his usual subject, a Picasso-like Lam, and an enchanting Carrington, "La Dame Ovale." An unusually satisfactory Lurçat is "L'Arménienne." This is the silly summer season when galleries dust off their unsold pictures, lower the prices, and call it a retrospective exhibition of the past year. The Matisse Gallery is fortunate in having rather better pictures rather better hung than most.

OILS BY PERLS ARTISTS. At the Perls Gallery, 32 East Fifty-eighth Street, until July 31.

Darrel Austin's tiresome charm pervades this gallery as always. The first picture by Mr. Austin that one sees reveals a new and mysterious world of green marshes and jungles inhabited by large cats with enormous incandescent eyes; at the third or fourth picture his secret seems less of a mystery and more of a trick. After this it becomes, "Oh, yes, Darrel Austin." Most of the other artists in this show have the same wispy charm, only less of it—Carol Blanchard, Karl Priete, and Frederick Haucke, whose imagination is reinforced by a hideously solid technique. There is also a dull Utrillo, an early Vlaminck, and a small but fine Roualt.

MUSIC

IT WAS in 1931 that Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, originally called "Rhapsody in Rivets," led me to reflect on the fallacious notion that since American life included jazz and riveting, the music which "expresses" this life also had to include them.

This led me to the Russian parallel. A review in the Moscow News of a Suite from Shostakovitch's "Golden Age" had criticized him for not "utilizing in the service of the revolution and socialist construction all the mastery and technique which have been inherited from the old musical culture" and for failing "to affirm Soviet musical ideology"; and the question arose, what precisely was meant by utilizing musical technique in the service of the revolution and socialist construction, or by affirming Soviet musical ideology? I could see how literature might serve the revolution and socialist construction by using them as its material—since it must refer to phenomena of the physical world; and I could see how a song might do so through its words, a ballet through its action. But not music, or at any rate not the music which conveyed only states of feeling, and which, since it did not refer to the physical world, did not contain within itself anything that could be socialistic or capitalistic. The one kind of music that did refer to the physical Russian scene was music like Mossolov's "Iron Foundry"; but this was hardly different from Honegger's "Pacific 231"; in addition it was unimportant, unsatisfying as music; and we were told by Sergei Radamsky that even the Russian workers did not like it because they heard enough noise in the factories. And Radamsky told us how the composer served socialist construction in symphonic works: he used an idiom that expressed "the Russian worker's and peasant's simplicity and directness in melody and rhythm," and in this way created "music for all and not for a few intellectuals." In other words, the worker and the peasant were not to be allowed to share the advantages of the intellectual and the artist; the intellectual and the artist were to be made to share the disadvantages of the worker and peasant.

This train of thought was brought back to my mind by Nicholas Nabokov's recent article on Shostakovitch, in Harper's. Nabokov tells us of his first impressions of Shostakovitch's early works—that they were skilful but not particularly new or imaginative; and of his fear, when he read the score of the First Symphony, that "this synthetic and retrospective score" signalized the approach of a period when "perhaps our demand that music be primarily good in quality, new in spirit and technique, original in outlook would be subordinated to such principles as absolute and immediate comprehensibility to large masses of people and fulfillment of an educational mission, political and social." And he tells us that his fear has been realized in Shostakovitch's development in the years since then, including the "two painful years of banishment from public life . . . years of 'inner self-criticism' (as the Soviet press calls it) during which he simplified his art still farther and all of his original musical thinking was definitely swallowed up by the 'service to the cause.' " This service has required, for example—and here Nabokov answers my original question—a "redundant, blatant, and unconvincing optimism" which takes the form of "excessive and very conventional use of major triads, tunes and cadences in major keys, all of them describing the glorious and victorious events of the present in the most emphatic and banal musical language (minor modes are used to describe the dark and gloomy days of the past)," and of "a verbose and brassy style which soon becomes dreary and monotonous." The music is now so obviously understandable that it "ceases to be an artistic language in which the adventurous human mind discovers new laws and new problems which it endeavors to solve in a new way," and that "after a while one begins to wonder if even the most uneducated masses will not soon tire of it."

I have heard it argued that the damage to Shostakovitch might be a price worth paying for the social gain in the increased musical literacy achieved by having him write on the level of understanding of the masses. I should say first of all that in my opinion Shostakovitch's is not a case of music which promised to develop into something good but was made bad by political pressures: it was bad and had in it the promise of continued badness; and the pressures only made it worse. But the case might have been that of a potential Bach or Beethoven or Mozart; for all we know a composer of that magnitude may have been ruined in Russia; and I contend that the musical literacy of the masses did not require any such sacrifice: if simple music was needed for simple minds and tastes there was more than enough of it available, and no need of making the best serious composers produce blatant banalities.

I have heard it argued also that it may be good for a composer to be compelled to write for an audience—any audience, even a mass audience. It is such schematizations that lead to the ideological ferocities of Russia during the past fifteen years. One begins, that is, with a streamlined schematization which has it that a composer must function in relation to an audience if he is to function well; instead of beginning with the mixed-up realities of how a composer produces valuable music or does not produce it, wins an audience with his music or does not win it. And one ends with attempting to get the composer to produce valuable music by placing him in a relation with an audience and compelling him to compose blatant banalities for it.

If one wanted a science like mathematical physics to exist for all and not for a few intellectuals one would accomplish this by educating workers and peasants to the point where they could understand the matters which an Einstein is concerned with, not by compelling him to concern himself only with what workers and peasants can understand. Or if one wanted to make the masses literate in the subject one would not set an Einstein to writing elementary texts for them. Nor would one think it might be good for him to have to do his thinking for an audience—any audience, even a mass audience.

Letters to the Editors

Britain and India

Dear Sirs: Dr. Vambery, in The Nation of June 26, asks why the Indian parties do not make a proposal to the British government for an Indian settlement. That still does not answer my question why the British don't make a move to break the Indian deadlock. The Chinese government has urged Great Britain to make such a move. Our own Administration would welcome it because an Indian settlement would hasten the victory over Japan. Mr. Churchill remains adamant.

Indian moderates have attempted to mediate. But the Viceroy has refused their requests to see Gandhi and Nehru, the imprisoned Congress leaders, without whom, of course, no Indian compromise is possible. The British government has also blocked every effort at a Hindu-Moslem agreement. If Dr. Vambery will look up the Herald Tribune of May 28, he will find an Associated Press dispatch which says that Mr. Jinnah, the president of the Moslem League, had asked Gandhi to write to him from jail giving his views on a Hindu-Moslem understanding. The British government "today denied Mohandas K. Gandhi facilities to communicate by letter with Mohammed Ali Jinnah." This is only one of many instances.

The Indian parties are agreed on what they want. All Indian parties are committed to independence from Great Britain. They do not expect it during the war, and I do not advocate the departure of the British until after the war. But the Indian parties do not believe, in view of Churchill's statements and of British acts in India, that the British propose to free India after the war.

Dr. Vambery cannot prove that there will be civil war in India if the British leave. I could quote British experts on India now in this country who say privately that the Hindus and Moslems would unite if the British quit India. An imperialist government can divide a colony as long as it wishes. That is why Gandhi has been saying that there is no hope of solving the Hindu-Moslem problem until the British depart, and that the problem can speedily be solved when the British do depart.

Incidentally, suppose a seer had said to the American Founding Fathers: "You want independence for the thirteen colonies. But I warn you that there will be a civil war in 1861." What would the Fathers have replied? We had a civil war, Russia and China had civil wars. I think India can avoid a civil war if the outside world helps.

Dr. Vambery suggests that Ireland and South Africa enjoy more independence than many sovereign states. Yet large sections of the population in those countries want complete independence from England. India wants to be free. Perhaps all the Latin American republics would be better off inside the United States. Does Vambery want us to annex them? India is a poor, oppressed colony and there is plenty of concrete evidence to show that the British have hampered the economic and educational progress of India. It is wrong to compare the British dominions with India. The dominions are white. The British treat Indians as colored inferiors. The Indians unanimously dislike it.

What right has England to rule India? LOUIS FISCHER

Wanted: Good Teachers

Dear Sirs: The teapot tempest stirred by the New York Times history survey has so far left the real problem untouched. The contentions of both the Times and its critics are partly true, but largely irrelevant. On the one hand, the questions were none too well chosen, and many students obviously spoofed their examiners. On the other, it is indisputable that most college freshmen, and upperclassmen, are grossly ignorant not only of American history but of the whole social structure framed and inhabited by civilized man. But progressive education is not the issue, whatever may be its merits or defects.

Anyone who has seen America's educational system from the inside will not be surprised—and only therefore not appalled—at a report by Drew Middleton in the New York Times Magazine for May 2 revealing the provincialism and thoughtlessness of American soldiers in North Africa. Many must be high-school graduates, at least; yet except for some higher officers Mr. Middleton found them not only uninformed but indifferent about the issues for which they fight and die. A vague antipathy toward the British, until cured by experience, a vague benevolence toward the "lesser breeds" (including the "German people" as somehow mysteriously distinct from the Nazis), an intellectual curiosity satisfied by sports pages and comic strips, a clear-cut desire to beat the enemy physically and then go home and forget the whole thing—this is the mental equipment of America's fighting men. This is the result of our boasted system of education. Obviously it is not the result specifically of ignorance of American history, but quite as obviously it is a related phenomenon.

This phenomenon is doubtless agreeable to the Stone Age mentality of Colonel McCormick and other isolationists. But thoughtful Americans find it ominous and would like to know the cause. Progressive educators blame the rigidity, compartmentalism, emphasis on uninterpreted facts, and use of mechanical drill that are alleged to characterize the traditional system, which, they add, still dominates the nation's schools. Traditionalists blame the lack of discipline, the contempt for the past, the uncritical enthusiasm for abstract ideals and impossible reforms that are supposed to prevail in progressive schools. Specifically, it is charged in the current controversy that there has been a widespread substitution of "social studies" for history; and that the result is usually an indigestible hash of economics, sociology, psychology, and political science—a mélange that not one teacher in a hundred is equipped to teach and not one student in a thousand able to assimilate.

The sad fact is that the charges of each party against the other seem partially valid, while the claim of either to positive achievement remains unproved. I taught for some years at an Eastern college which drew many of its students from the old-line New England preparatory schools and many others from the extreme progressive schools of the Chicago area. Both groups were equally well—or ill—informed; both were equal in intellectual initiative—or lack of it. The truth is that the failure of American education is a failure not in method but in personnel; the lack is not of good teaching but of good teachers.

Of course it would be absurdly unfair to offer a blanket indictment or to imply that most of those who are failing are not doing the best they can. But their best is obviously not good enough. Why?

First, the country's best minds and most compelling personalities do not go into teaching. There is bitter truth in Shaw's jest: "Those who can, do. Those who can't, teach." The general attitude of college students and professors is that those who cannot meet the competition in medicine or engineering or business administration or scientific research of various sorts can always enter secondary-school teaching. It is a notorious fact that students in teachers' colleges and schools of education are generally inferior mentally to those in other fields. The better students prepare to do things; the poorer students prepare to teach.

The schools and colleges that profess to prepare them can be fairly blamed for partly causing and greatly aggravating this sorry state of affairs. Yet to some extent they can also be excused. Faced with the task of providing an immense number of teachers for a rapidly expanding secondary-school system, overawed by technological triumphs and by the equally formidable if less spectacular achievements of "scholarship," they assumed that there is a comparable technique for teaching and for training teachers; that education is a science and not an art, a technique and not a calling. How was it to be expected that the sponsors of this new "science," themselves mediocre and faced with a vast influx of mediocrity; aware, too, of the distrust or contempt of their academic colleagues, of men of science, and of men of affairs—that they should not seek to conceal and deny, rather than confront and try to deal with, the lack of talent among their students, the lack among themselves of anything to teach? What more natural than that they should take refuge in an unintelligible jargon, in pretensions to scientific measurement and correlation of abstractions and imponderables, in violent attacks on traditional philosophies based on a qualitative conception of human life and character?

For the fact is that with all its professed reverence for "personality" the new education regards that personality as essentially a product of machinery. Put prospective teachers through courses in child psychology, mental tests, and teaching "methods"—teach them how to teach!—and our educational problem is solved. It does not matter that all the qualities of character that make for good teaching—tact, tolerance, patience, kindness, self-forgetfulness, a union of common sense with imagination—are stultified rather than stimulated by this mechanical approach. It does not matter that the courses in history and literature and genuine science that might help to develop these qualities are crowded out by required courses in "education" that are generally so senseless and futile that the best students refuse to submit to them.

Not that the other college courses are always well taught. The dulness, the pedantry, the smugness, the circumspection, the petty vanity that characterize a shocking proportion of college faculty members in all fields offer little aid or inspiration to students who might be inclined to look on a teaching career as something more than a meal ticket.

The real villain of the piece is of course an unenlightened and indifferent public. While making material wealth our measure of success, we refuse to pay our teachers adequate salaries. While professing to believe in "free enterprise" and the Bill of Rights, we stifle all intellectual enterprise in our teachers by forcing them to conform in word and act to local and often absurd mores and political and social creeds—and when we try to protect them, we set up a system of tenure that offers perfect shelter for the dull or idle or uninspired. While priding ourselves on our hard-headed practicality, we have turned over our school system to the guidance of people who believe in the astounding fantasy that education is primarily a matter of method. And finally, fervently desiring for our children a happier and fuller existence in a better world than ours, we set an example in our private lives of selfishness, aimlessness, and triviality and leave entirely to our bewildered and overburdened teachers the task of making from these children informed, alert, altruistic, and morally responsible men and women.

These are a few of the problems facing American education. Compulsory courses in American history will not solve them.

Voice from the Deep South

Dear Sirs: In a recent issue of your magazine whose name claims a national appeal, you reported the exclamations of a sailor observing the bickerings of the House over the passage of the Marcantonio Anti-Poll-Tax bill. May I correct the sailor? It's not the Civil War that reoccurs—it's that twelve-year term of Northern barbarism and legislation closely akin to present-day Nazi atrocities and brutal treatment of conquered nations, then known as Reconstruction. Not only was this the bitterest potion ever forced upon a bleeding South and a bondage, tyranny, and exploitation unequaled by the Allied demands at Versailles, but it was a sin and blotch so black that the North ought to have hidden its wicked face when, after the downfall of such vultures as Thaddeus Stevens and that lawless gang whose brothers were at the same time the carpetbaggers down here, its brutality had been realized. No doubt that injustice has never been fully revealed. Yet I leave you these truths to search out in such articles as A. R. Moore's One Hundred Years of Reconstruction in the May issue of the Journal of Southern History. Of course you who in your "egocentric sectionalism" consider the North the whole nation will shriek prejudice—but consider your own "narrowisms," first, if you please.

But that is not the main point. The whip that incites any true Southerner to boiling fury is that d—— Yankee ignorant howling: "Liberate the poor uneducated masses of blacks and whites from the arrogant heel of lazy Southerners." Bah! Evidently you have been fed on a "wholesome" diet of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," probably the worst-written and most infamous book ever published (by such a person with such romanticism). O ye heavens! If you only knew how we must keep peace as we do! We recognize the problem, and those who are more progressive must strive to balance the passionate hatred of some of our own people for our less fortunate brothers. But, please, let us do it! You don't know—you can never know until you have had to shape from a Yankee-dominated government of seventy years ago a livable and decent social order. Look what you gave us to build from! Everything—our homes, our fortunes, if any—in ruins; our social order convulsed into a madman's inferno. Only when you who have not lived here understand these things by experience will you be more considerate.

Let us now play "Dixie"!

THE MASSIVE GERMAN ATTACK IN THE Orel-Belgorod sector may prove to have only limited objectives but there is good reason to believe that the long-delayed summer offensive has been launched. Although the Nazis reverted to Blitz tactics, pouring in a tremendous armored force without artillery preparation, the Red Army was not caught napping. It had fully anticipated an assault in just this part of the front and its gunners showed their alertness and skill by killing off enemy tanks in huge numbers. The Russian communique admits, however, that the Germans effected some small penetrations, and as we go to press news comes of an extension of the fighting along a 200-mile front. The immediate Nazi aim would appear to be the nipping off of the big salient held by the Russians between Orel and Belgorod; their larger hopes, as Donald W. Mitchell suggests in an article on page 36, may be to capture Voronezh—the key city they were never able to occupy fully last summer—and then to swing north against Moscow. Hitler's armies on the eastern front are still formidable, but we are confident that the Russians, even if forced to give ground, will not crack. Nevertheless, once it is certain that the Germans are committed to an eastern offensive, swift action in the west becomes imperative. For apart from the importance of relieving the pressure on Russia, we now have a chance to force the Axis to split its strength. Recent reports suggest that Germany has, after all, decided to aid in the defense of Italy. This will make the immediate task of invading Sicily more difficult but it is good news, nevertheless, for Italy can prove an even more exhausting vacuum for Germany than was Tunisia. But for the time being Germany could probably handle a Mediterranean attack without reducing its strength in Russia. To take full advantage of the present opportunity we need to open a front in western Europe as well.

THE BEST NEWS MR. CHURCHILL WAS ABLE to give in his Guildhall speech was that of the striking defeat suffered by the U-boats in the North Atlantic during the past two months. The Germans have been counting heavily on their submarines to stave off disaster, for these are the last remaining offensive weapon that can be employed against growing Anglo-American power. Earlier in the year our shipping losses were very heavy and German boasts of the effectiveness of the under-sea blockade seemed altogether too well founded. But new tactics and weapons, wielded by a new combined command in the North Atlantic, have since proved their worth. Working in unison, planes, patrol boats, destroyers and other warships have overcome the massed attacks of the submarine "wolf-packs." In May between thirty and forty were sunk. The much bombed German shipyards and factories can hardly build replacements to match such losses, and the problem of providing trained crews is likely to become acute if we can maintain the pace. Reports of a mutiny of U-boat sailors in Norway must be treated with reserve but we do not forget that in the last war the morale of the German navy started to crack in the submarine division. The Nazis have frankly admitted that the tonnage of allied shipping sunk in June was the smallest for any month since the war started but they claim that the setback is only temporary and that the U-boats will soon be achieving new successes.

IN THE DIPLOMATIC WAR BETWEEN THE United States and the Fighting French—which is rapidly turning into a war between the United States and the French people—the most important recent maneuver is the visit of General Giraud to Washington. To invite Giraud rather than De Gaulle was to underline our government's support of the status quo in North Africa and its determined opposition to the changes demanded by the Fighting French. It was a deliberate insult to De Gaulle, the more flagrant when one recalls that several times in recent months a trip to this country was projected by the Fighting French leader and at the last moment "postponed" at the request of the State Department. The effect of American behavior is proving to be exactly what we predicted last week. All reports agree that anti-American feeling in North Africa is rising; it may easily reach the point of public demonstration or even of explosion. And the bitterness of Frenchmen there is echoed in every group of free Europeans here and in England. But European democrats have been losing faith in American intentions so fast that our policy in Africa does little more than confirm their worst fears.

A MORE OMINOUS CHANGE IS THE GROWING feeling against Britain. No longer is the Churchill government looked upon as the defender of a free Europe. The Prime Minister's unqualified indorsement of American policy, expressed in action as well as in his speech last Thursday, has generated resentment both among the governments in exile and democrats from occupied and enemy countries. They see the future of their own lands reflected in the Anglo-American attitude toward France, and what they see weakens their confidence in Britain as well as the United States. What pressure, they ask, induced Churchill to repudiate his close relationship with De Gaulle? What price did America pay for Britain's support? How many other bargains affecting the future of Europe are in the making? In this mood of gloom and suspicion it is not impossible that the hopes of the peoples of Europe will crystallize more and more around the figure of De Gaulle, whose resistance to the overbearing interference of the United States and Britain has contributed as much to his growing prestige as his unbending patriotism and his refusal to make deals with traitors and fascists. Such a division in the Allied ranks would be tragic. If it comes about it will be the work of the apostles of "expediency"—from President Roosevelt down.

THE GOVERNMENT'S ANTI-TRUST SUIT against the Associated Press has put that organization under the painful necessity of showering the United Press with bouquets. Many of the seventy-seven affidavits the A. P. has filed in opposition to the government's motion for a summary judgment in the case are, in effect, testimonials to the efficiency of its chief rival and modest disclaimers of outstanding merit on its own part. This bashfulness is intended to offset the Attorney General's contention that denial of A. P. service to any paper is a substantial competitive handicap. Not at all, the A. P. retorts; any paper able to secure U. P. service can get along very well without our help. It would be unkind, perhaps, to recall the stress the A. P.'s past publicity laid on its "superior performance in all categories of the news." But we cannot resist pointing out that another group of affidavits bearing on the question of the value of A. P. memberships are at variance with its shy deprecation of talk about its "indispensability." Statements furnished by several experts, for instance, testify that the amount which an applicant must pay under the new by-laws to existing members in his field is less than the true value. In Baltimore, according to Paul Patterson, president of the company which publishes the Sun papers, a morning membership is worth at least $175,000 and an evening one $150,000 or more. It is difficult to see why memberships in the A. P. should be valued at such amounts, which, of course, are in addition to cash assessments paid weekly for actual service, if in fact they do not confer a competitive advantage.

THE PRINCIPAL PURPOSE OF THE SMALLER War Plants Corporation was to take prime contracts from war agencies and subcontract them to smaller business men. The latest report of the SWPC, as submitted to the White House by WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson, shows how little progress the corporation has made along these lines, though it is already more than a year old. In that time it has taken three prime contracts. One is to build an $85,000 experimental barge for the Army Engineering Corps. The second is to make $500,000 worth of reamers and arbors for the navy. The third—the only substantial one—is a $1,500,000 special contract for a group of thirty-one wood and metal furniture firms. It is significant that this contract was taken not from a war agency, but from the Federal Public Housing Authority, and that it calls not for war production but for furniture. Obviously the armed services are as hostile as ever to this scheme for parceling out war work among smaller firms, as is Nelson himself. The compromise by which the SWPC was placed under Nelson has succeeded, as we predicted at the time, in destroying most of its potentialities for good. Small business is still largely dependent on the bounty of big, which continues to subcontract according to its convenience. This convenience, now as before, is not synonymous with the best interests of war production.

WE MUST ADMIT THAT WE ARE FASCINATED by the attitudes and methods of James C. Petrillo. We can't believe for a moment that he will in the end be allowed to abolish the transcription business—which he is frank to say has nothing to give him—in order to "get at" the radio stations which use the transcriptions. Yet his ban on recording, issued last August, still stands, and he says he is not interested in negotiation. Petrillo's basic idea of replacing every "juke-box" with a live musician seems to us about as practical and desirable as Don Quixote's desire to restore medieval chivalry. But whereas Don Quixote fought the windmills in vain, Petrillo has actually succeeded in "stopping the discs." Petrillo is clearly inviting Congressional action; he is also steadily enlisting public opinion on the side of those, in and out of Congress, who are always waiting for an excuse to attack labor unions.

THE DETROIT RIOTS WERE GOOD NEWS TO the commentators of the Axis, who have had rather poor pickings lately as far as the war itself is concerned. The Japanese were able to tell their vast audience throughout Asia that "Americans are giving vent to their psychopathic race prejudice by hunting down innocent Negroes as they would hunt down wild beasts." The Tokyo radio quoted an editorial in the Nippon Times which asserted that "it is a singular fact that supposedly civilized Americans in normal times will deny Negroes the right to live in decent neighborhoods, deny them opportunity to engage in respectable jobs, deny them right or access to the same restaurant, theater, or train accommodations as themselves, and then periodically will run amok to lynch Negroes individually or to slaughter them wholesale—old men and children alike—in race wars like the present one." The French heard from their German-controlled radio that the Detroit affair was "proof of the internal disorganization of a country torn by social injustice, race hatreds, regional disputes, the violence of the irritated proletariat, of a capitalistic police whose gangsterism has often been mentioned in American literature and movies. . . . Today, on the morrow of the bloody incidents of Detroit, the French people, imbued with a sense of social justice, realize the dangers for world civilization inherent in the American aims of world domination." Is there anyone who still believes that race relations in this country are merely a domestic problem of which the solution can be deferred until the war is won?

The Case for Subsidies

THERE are three major problems to be solved with regard to our war-time food supply: How to grow enough to supply the armed forces, meet lend-lease obligations, and provide a healthy diet for civilians. How to distribute supplies fairly so that all groups in all parts of the country obtain their fair share. How to maintain prices at a level which will enable the anti-inflation line to be held.

The special task of the War Food Administration is to solve the first of these problems but Mr. Chester Davis, who has just resigned as head of that agency, took the view that in order to make sure of production he would have to exercise authority over prices and rationing. Moreover, it was clear that he leaned toward the farm-bloc's thesis that the only way to guarantee that the necessary food would be grown was to increase the incentive of the producer by letting prices rise. But as guardian of consumer interests, the OPA was bound to oppose this policy and so too was the Director of Economic Stabilization, Fred M. Vinson, who in addition to acting as umpire between the WFA and the OPA, is responsible for seeing that inflation is held in check. In line with that duty he has recently vetoed a very moderate wage increase for the lower paid railroad workers. He could hardly turn round and authorize the slipping of the leash on farm prices. For the line which the President has ordered held is already bent and will undoubtedly snap if the cost of living is allowed to advance much farther.

Must we then choose between inflation and short supplies? The subsidy program is an attempt to meet this dilemma by giving the farmers a bigger incentive to produce without making the consumer pay the cost directly. Opponents of the plan argue that subsidies merely push the burden from the citizen as consumer to the citizen as taxpayer and are no less inflationary than higher prices. There is an element of truth in this assertion although actually the effect of subsidies is to bring on the disease in a mild and controllable form. For a dollar injected into the system in this way may be the means of saving several dollars. If food processors raise their bid to growers under the ordinary rules of supply and demand the increase in price will snowball en route to the housewife's basket as each factor in distribution adds on his percentage margin. So that the final cost to the consumer is far greater than the added compensation to the producer. On the other hand, if the processor is given a subsidy in order to pay a better price to the farmer, his actual cost basis is not disturbed nor is that of the distributors through whom his product reaches the public.

Again, as the President pointed out in his message vetoing the C. C. C. bill with its riders hamstringing the Administration's food program, any appreciable increase in the cost of living, which is already 8 per cent higher than in May, 1942—the point at which the "Little Steel" formula was promulgated—will inevitably mean a rise in wage costs. An overall wage increase of 10 per cent would, he estimated, result in a 4½ per cent increase in the general price level and, as the government is now spending approximately $100 billion a year, this would add about $4½ billion to war costs. If, therefore, retail food prices can be stabilized and "the line" held by spending one or two billion dollars, the net saving to the taxpayer will be very considerable.

In its opposition to subsidies the Farm Bloc, which has never been adverse to interfering with the laws of supply and demand in a buyers' market, came out as the champion of laisser faire, though not, of course, to the extent of abolishing the parity price concept or abandoning crop loans. Yet everyone else agrees that in conditions of total war we cannot leave the economy to the mercy of supply and demand. What would be the price of steel if we did, or of copper or the wages of skilled mechanics? Government control is essential and it cannot be confined to certain sectors while others go untrammelled.

The great value of subsidies in a controlled economy is that they introduce a flexible element into a structure which otherwise would be too rigid. They make it possible for the government to provide incentives where they are required to stimulate extra production without risking repercussions which would upset the balance. In some cases the Food Administrator can use subsidies to underwrite "support prices" announced in advance of the planting or breeding season, so that the farmer knows in advance what minimum return he may expect. In other cases it may seem advisable for the government to buy the whole crop for resale at a loss so that wholesale and retail ceilings are not disturbed.

But if the Administration is to employ this kind of strategy successfully its hands must be left tolerably free so that it can adapt its plans to changing conditions. We hope, therefore, that as the House has sustained the President's veto of the C. C. C. bill and agreed to extend the agency's life through next January 31, the Senate will not waste time attempting to tailor a new strait-jacket for the executive.

The Pacific Offensive

FOR a public anxiously awaiting news of the invasion of Europe, the American offensive in the Southwest Pacific, successful as it seems, has been somewhat disappointing. Although the coordinated land, sea, and air operations may exceed in size and scope anything previously undertaken by the United Nations in the Pacific, they seem to imply a resumption of the slow, costly process of island-hopping which we were assured had been ruled out as the basis of Allied strategy. The capture of such minute islands as Rendova, New Georgia, Woodlark, and the Trobriand group is obviously not going to have much effect on the outcome of the Pacific struggle.

But the very fact that a campaign led by MacArthur, an outspoken foe of the island-by-island strategy, starts with such minor objectives suggests that the new campaign may be part of something much bigger, the nature of which is yet to be revealed. What it is can only be a matter for speculation. The renewal of heavy air attacks on Kiska suggests that a landing on the last Japanese outpost in the Aleutians may not be far off. But if this is the beginning of the long-promised offensive against Japan, the final objective is unlikely to be the capture of outposts such as Kiska, the Solomons, or even Rabaul. It would seem more probable that attacks on the extreme south and extreme north of Japan's elongated defense lines would have as their purpose the drawing of Japanese forces toward the flanks in preparation for a powerful blow at some more crucial point near the center.

There are several vulnerable points. The Chinese have recently shown unexpected strength in minor offensives in the Rice Bowl district of the upper Yangtze and in the Hangchow area south of Shanghai. The activities around Hangchow particularly bear watching. If the Chinese succeed in clearing this region, air bases could be prepared within easy bomber range of the chief Japanese industrial centers. The United Nations already have some air bases in Chekiang province 150 to 200 miles west of Hangchow, and the Tokyo radio recently asserted that American air bases had been established in Fukien province to the south. Liberator bombers, now in China, might attack Japan from any of these points.

Another and more likely spot for a major United Nations offensive is the Burma-Thailand area. Such a drive was widely discussed at the time of Prime Minister Churchill's recent visit to Washington. While a major offensive against Burma would presumably have to await the end of the present monsoon season, landings might be made in Thailand somewhat earlier, thus cutting off the Japanese in Burma.

A third possibility for a strong blow against Japan would be directly across the Pacific from Pearl Harbor and Midway. The first step in such a drive would presumably be the reoccupation of Wake Island, followed by attacks on Saipan, Rota, Guam, and the Bonin Islands. Many observers feel that this must be the route of the final onslaught on Japan, but it cannot be launched until the United States has unquestioned naval supremacy, particularly in battleships and aircraft carriers. Recent reports, however, indicate a tremendous strengthening of the Pacific fleet, and it is possible that we are ready for at least the initial steps of such a drive.

The launching of a sudden and rather unexpected Pacific offensive at this time has raised a question in many minds—including those of the enemy—as to whether the main 1943 drive is to be against Japan rather than Germany. Churchill's Guildhall speech seemed to imply this when he refrained from promising an invasion of Europe this summer. The renewal of second-front demands from Moscow points in the same direction. The tremendous emphasis being placed on air attacks over Germany and Italy suggests that for this summer the Allies are going to test the theory that the Axis can be knocked out by air power alone. But this again is pure guesswork. The attack in the Southwest Pacific might easily be intended to cover up preparations for a major offensive against Europe. Churchill was obviously not intending to give out any military information when he refrained from specifying an attack on Europe. His promise of "heavy fighting in the Mediterranean and elsewhere before the leaves of autumn fall" may well have been made primarily to confuse the enemy.

Whether the present Pacific offensive is the beginning of major action against Japan or a subsidiary action intended to confuse the enemy will probably not be apparent for some weeks. But the hard facts of the situation would seem to demand important action against both Japan and Germany this summer. Reliable reports from the conquered areas of the Pacific say that the Japanese are making remarkable progress in consolidating their conquests, both politically and militarily. They are still unable to make full use of the vast natural resources of the Indies, Burma, Indo-China, and China proper, but their industrial potential has grown tremendously within the past year. Information regarding Germany's war potential is more difficult to get. But the most dependable reports indicate that despite the bombings Germany is succeeding in strengthening the defensive capacities of the European Fortress each month. And unless invasion comes soon, Germany will have the full use of one of the best harvests since the war began. Sound strategy demands offensive action in both Europe and Asia. The fact that so much time has been taken in preparation may be due to slackness or over-caution—or it may be a sign that something big is brewing.

Education, Limited

WHILE grandiose plans go forward for the reeducation of Europe, and the New York Times continues to bewail the inability of freshmen to identify James K. Polk, little is being done to remedy the desperate situation of American education. The National Education Association, meeting at Indianapolis, heard a report from Dr. Alonzo F. Myers which substantiates all that a few lonely figures like Senator Thomas of Utah have been trying to tell Congress. Dr. Myers, who is chairman of the N. E. A.'s commission for the defense of democracy through education, said that more than 100,000 rural teachers left their jobs between May and October last year. Thousands of these teachers, Dr. Myers said, are working for less than $600 a year. "Even morons can earn more than twice that amount today."

The difficulty, as Dr. George D. Strayer of Teachers College pointed out, is that there are many areas, notably in the South, where state and local resources are inadequate to maintain minimum standards of education. The only hope for such areas lies in the $300,000,000 federal-aid-to-education bill, which has been bogged down in Congress since 1937. Though Senator Thomas and other supporters of the measure have been able to show its vital relationship to the war effort—enough men for fifteen divisions have been found too nearly illiterate to serve in the army—there seems to be as little interest in the measure this year as in previous years.

The problem is not merely one of eradicating illiteracy but of providing a larger background of technical competence and scientific training for a war in which success depends more than ever before on technological efficiency. Despite the war, one finds in education as in other fields the old conflict between those who wish to maintain scarcity and those who want an all-out effort. The former are still concerned with having "too many doctors, lawyers, and engineers," and betray a general hostility to the enlightenment of the common man. The others not only see current shortages of doctors, lawyers, and engineers but are willing to face the task of building a new society in which there will be as much use for skilled minds and hands for the pursuits of peace as there are today for those of war.

Why Wallace Spoke Out

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 2

LET no one call Henry Wallace an ineffectual dreamer. He has just won his second victory in six months over Jesse Jones. In this town, which worships "toughness" but usually mistakes the loud-mouthed for the strong, that is an achievement. For no other single figure here, unless it be the President himself, wields more political power than the arrogant banker from Houston, Texas. Last December Wallace went before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and persuaded it to abandon an amendment which would have restored Jones's power over the purchase of critical materials abroad. Danaher of Connecticut carried the ball for Jesse then, but "Don't call it my amendment" was Danaher's aggrieved comment after the hearing. This time Jones's tool was McKellar of Tennessee, with an amendment which would have given the RFC a veto over purchases by the Board of Economic Warfare. The Senate Appropriations Committee decided to abandon the amendment after the Vice-President let loose with a scorcher.

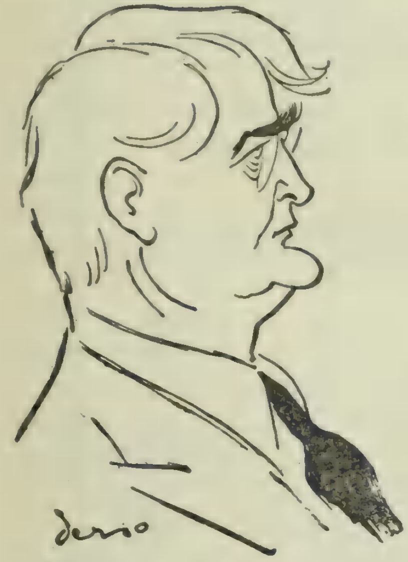
McKellar opened his campaign with a pathetic picture. "Mr. Jesse Jones," he said to the Senate on June 4, "testified a day or two ago before the so-called Economy Committee that Mr. Milo Perkins absolutely ran the entire establishment of 2,620 employees; that his word was law, even over him, Mr. Jesse Jones. . . ." The establishment referred to was the Board of Economic Warfare. The despotism, were it but true, would call for bell-ringing. Until now, nobody's word has been law for Jesse Jones, except perhaps that of a second vice-president of Standard Oil, Aluminum Company of America, or Bethlehem Steel. If it were not necessary for someone to obey the White House injunction against intra-Administration feuding, the President might have been lambasting him publicly long ago.

It is true, as a weary New Dealer told me recently, that "nothing in this town is so easily ignored as a White House directive." No one has been so brazenly successful in ignoring them as Jesse Jones. As early as the fall of 1940 the President instructed Jones to finance a power line which would have made New York City's idle power available to war plants in upstate New York. Consolidated Edison preferred to leave this power idle rather than risk the possibility that the same line would bring cheap St. Lawrence power to the metropolis after the war was over, and the Aluminum Company was afraid the line would encourage public development of the St. Lawrence. The line has never been completed. In August, 1940, with the President's approval, Emil Schram, then head of the RFC, promised the Bonneville Power Authority and a group of public-power authorities in the state of Washington a $70,000,000 loan to buy the Puget Sound Power and Light. The company was heavily overcapitalized, $17,000,000 in arrears on its preferred dividends, and lacked credit for the expansion of facilities to supply additional power to the new war industries of the Northwest. But this extension of public ownership was opposed by power interests, and though the President and Secretary Ickes prodded Jones for more than a year, the promised loan has yet to be granted.

I cite these facts to show that the differences between Jones and the Vice-President cannot be attributed to the latter's temperament, which happens to be mild; Jones would try the patience of a St. Francis of Assisi. No one else in Washington except the accomplished bureaucrats of the State Department has gone so far in perfecting the art of governing by not doing things, by mislaying documents, overlooking directives, and forgetting to sign checks. This last has been Jones's forte since the President on April 13, 1942, placed the acquisition of strategic materials in the hands of the BEW, with full power—on paper—to direct the RFC to make the necessary expenditures. The procedure is for the War Production Board to decide what critical materials are needed, and how much. The BEW negotiates the contracts. The RFC at the BEW's direction is supposed to arrange the actual purchase, transportation, and warehousing. This is what the RFC, when the royal whim dictates, forgets to do.

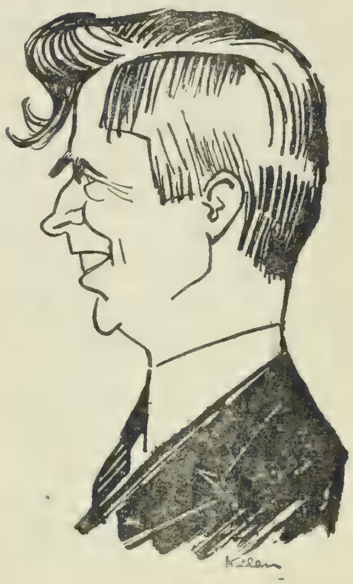
The Board of Economic Warfare was established on July 30, 1941. The executive order of April 13, 1942, was long overdue, as one Congressional investigation after another has demonstrated. The Vice-President's vigorous statement provides a bill of particulars on what Jones had succeeded by that time in not accomplishing. The OPM had asked for 3,000 tons of beryl ore, which is used as an alloy with copper. Jones had made one contract for 300 tons; none had been delivered. The OPM had recommended the purchase of 178,571 tons of castor seeds, which provide a hydraulic fluid for war machines and a protective coating for plane motors. None had been purchased. The OPM asked for 2,500 tons of cobalt, which strengthens high-speed cutting steels. By April 13, 1942, Jones had contracted for the purchase of 159 tons. The OPM wanted 6,000 tons of corundum from South Africa with which to grind glass and lenses for military purposes. No purchases were made. We are dependent on the Far East for vital fats and oils. In October, 1941, the OPM recommended the purchase of 30,000 tons. In November the figure was raised to 208,000; in January, 1942, to 308,000; in February, to 317,499. By April 13 the RFC had contracted for 2,200 tons of one type of oil; none had been delivered. "For all practical purposes," the Vice-President said, "virtually nothing was done by Mr. Jones to build a government stockpile of fats and oils even after Pearl Harbor, when the Japs were conquering the Far East." Jesse was still waging a sitzkrieg.

Palm oil is essential in making tinplate. The OPM before Pearl Harbor asked for 30,000 tons. Amount purchased by the RFC four months after Pearl Harbor: none. The RFC had bought no flax, though the OPM had recommended the purchase of 6,500 tons. It had bought only 1,210 tons of jute in India, though the OPM wanted 80,000 tons. Sisal twine is essential in harvesting crops. The OPM wanted first 100,000 and then 250,000 tons; Jones has bought about 33,600 tons. Tantalite, one of the most urgent of strategic material needs, was the subject of a flurry of correspondence before Pearl Harbor among the OPM, the State Department, and the RFC. The purchase of 1,000,000 tons was recommended; none was bought. Zirconium is essential in making flares, signals, tracer ammunition, and blasting caps. Three months before Pearl Harbor the OPM urged the purchase of "reasonable amounts" in Brazil. Four months later: no contracts to purchase had yet been made. As in most items, Jones seemed to think the reasonable amount was none at all.



Jesse Jones

No one with imagination and a sense of responsibility to our fighting men can read the Wallace statement without a sense of agony. For Jones has continued to be the biggest single bottleneck of the war program since, and despite, the April directive. The day after it was issued General MacArthur wired Washington that 2,000,000 seeds of the Far Eastern cinchona had been brought out of the Philippines on one of the last planes leaving for Australia and "must be planted without delay." Cinchona produces quinine, and malaria was a more deadly foe than the Japanese on Bataan. It was proposed to plant the seeds in Costa Rica. It was not until late January, 1943, that the RFC would finally agree to provide some funds for this project. It will be 1946 before any quinine can be produced. The months lost are lives lost. "For all the full power the President has given the Board of Economic Warfare over imports," Wallace said, "we are helpless when Jesse Jones, as our banker, refuses to sign checks in accordance with our directives." If only our enemies had a Jesse Jones, too!



Henry Wallace

All the vices the worst Congressional ranters attribute to what is left of the New Deal are exemplified in Jones and the RFC. Nowhere will one find a more lush growth of bureaucratic evils; nowhere is there more red tape, nowhere more irresponsibility. Nowhere else has post-war planning—in the sinister sense—so interfered with the war effort. Jones is dominated by the petty ambition of a petty banker's mind—to show a profit on the books of the RFC when the war is over. His great fear is lest RFC operations interfere after the war with business as usual and monopoly. The war itself is incidental and peripheral in his thinking. His arrogance flows from his power; his power from the possession of the greatest money bag in history. Many members of Congress, eager to dip into its bounty for their constituents, are his flunkies.

That the Vice-President has had the courage to expose and attack this millstone around the neck of the war effort should make every decent and patriotic American grateful. That the Vice-President succeeded in killing off the McKellar amendment, as he did the Danaher amendment before it, testifies encouragingly to the existence of a substratum of good sense and non-partisanship in the Senate. But if Jones and his reactionary Southern friends have their way, Wallace will pay for his temerity with the Vice-Presidency. They want the nomination for one of themselves in 1944, and they want Wallace's political scalp.

The first vehicle chosen for the attack is the Byrd committee, which, after meekly accepting Jones's refusal to let it look into the books of the RFC, is now dutifully to be let loose on the BEW. Jones's own reply to the Wallace statement is of interest only to the student of semantics; it rests on over-all figures as to his "commitments" and what he "initiated." There is always a big gap between Jones's commitments and his actual expenditures; the latest report of the RFC subsidiary which buys up certain commodities to keep them out of the hands of the Axis shows an impressive total of $226,000,000 in authorizations—but only $30,000,000 in actual disbursements. Jones cannot afford the investigation on which he loudly insists, and must take the offensive. In that offensive he will have strong support in Congress and even stronger support in the press. For Jones may be staking his future on his attack upon Wallace, and the future of big business is tied up with Jones. His Defense Plant Corporation owns $7,000,000,000 worth of facilities in the aviation, aluminum, synthetic-rubber, magnesium, steel, machine-tool, automotive, radio, and mining industries. And their post-war disposal must be kept in safe hands. On the bargain counter of a post-war deflation, these facilities will lay the basis for fabulous private fortunes. In New Dealish hands they would be a threat to monopoly. "We do not have anybody in our organization," Jones boasted to the House Appropriations Committee in February, "that has any queer ideas." Big business dare not let so sound a thinker go down the drain, whatever comfort his small-mindedness may bring the Axis. Thus Jones and Wallace not only symbolize the best and worst tendencies in the war effort, as in American life, but are the focal points of the forces striving for mastery of our post-war future. Not only the lives of many in the field but the kind of America to which they will return depends in large part on the outcome of this struggle between the small-town Texas banker and the farmer-idealist from Iowa.

Hitler's Russian Dilemma

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

AS THE third year of the Russian war gets under way, Hitler faces one of the most difficult decisions of his career. His chances of carrying out a successful offensive are at best slim. Yet if he does not attempt a major attack to eliminate his most immediately dangerous foe, he will have to turn to face the United Nations in the west with the unbeaten Red Army at his back.

A prolonged feeling-out of strengths and weaknesses has been taking place along the thousand-mile front. German planes, borrowing the tactics of the R. A. F., have attempted to neutralize many of the cities behind the Russian lines, while the Soviet air force has concentrated on communications and transport facilities. Both sides have claimed disproportionate enemy air losses, the Russian claim being the more credible. Land attacks have been on a small scale, handicapped by difficult roads. Now, with an unusually protracted spring finally over and the roads passable again, the two most formidable armies on earth may at any moment spring into action along what is still the most important front of the war.

The Nazis, however, cannot attempt a smash-through in Russia with as great striking power as they had in 1941 or 1942. Many of the 218 divisions on the Russian front are below normal strength and have recently been regrouped. The Stalingrad and Tunisia débâcles cost the Germans large numbers of their best troops. That such losses are not necessarily fatal was shown by the Russians last year, when they got a little better than a draw after huge losses of first-line troops in 1941. But whether the Germans, with a smaller population from which to obtain reserves and with large commitments elsewhere, will be able to duplicate this performance is open to grave doubt.

With respect to air power they are in an even worse position. In 1941 and 1942 German ground forces operated under a protecting umbrella of planes which in both quantity and quality were superior to those of the Russians. Today this superiority is no longer present. Constant fighting and Allied bombing of German production centers have worn down the Luftwaffe to a point where it no longer can control the skies. Furthermore, the best pilots having been expended, the Germans have foolishly thrown in undertrained men—with a resultant increase of losses. Even without the lend-lease aid of its Western allies, Russia is producing today practically as many planes as Germany. And Russia has two great additional advantages: its new production centers are out of range of German bombing, and it is able to concentrate its forces against the Germans without worrying about the need for them elsewhere. The weakening of the Luftwaffe, first remarked in Western Europe less than a year ago, has become so general that Hitler is now inferior on every front.

Nor is there any likelihood that time will repair German weaknesses. The Russian industrial machine, while injured by the enemy's seizure of territory and resources, was able to move eastward out of reach, but this kind of escape is not possible for Germany. The attrition of blockade and aerial bombing is slowly but surely reducing the Nazis' war potential. The best indication of this is that Germany, despite the use of slave labor, is today producing 20 per cent less than a year ago. Meanwhile the American, British, and Russian industrial machines are building up an ever-mounting superiority in weapons. This advantage is qualitative as well as numerical, for the Germans, beset by many urgent needs, have done little retooling and brought out very few new weapons.

The Russians, it is true, have also suffered great losses of military man-power. Claiming 6,400,000 Germans killed and captured, they have admitted 4,200,000 casualties of their own. Their figures for the German losses are certainly too high and for their own too low; reversal of the two totals would probably be more nearly correct. Among the Russian casualties are scores of the best Soviet divisions, destroyed in the Blitzkrieg. In addition, the territory occupied by the enemy normally contained 50,000,000 people. Many of these were evacuated, but the rest have been lost to Stalin as workers and as military reserves. However, as I said, these losses, most of them sustained in 1941, did not prevent the Red Army from coming back forcefully in 1942.

Unlike the Wehrmacht, the Red Army has steadily improved in organization and technical development. The awkward system of dual command was abolished over a year ago. Discipline has been tightened and the position of the officer exalted. The original pattern of army organization, which failed to get the greatest value out of armored units because of their dispersion, has been altered. Divisions have been streamlined, made harder hitting. To the existing superiority in artillery there has been added at least parity in the air. The proper tactics for stopping a Blitzkrieg have been in use for a year and a half. The triumvirate in charge of military affairs at the opening of the war has been replaced by younger and more vigorous men whose reputations have been made in actual battle. In spite of its staggering losses the Red Army is probably more formidable than it was in 1941, while the Wehrmacht is clearly less so.

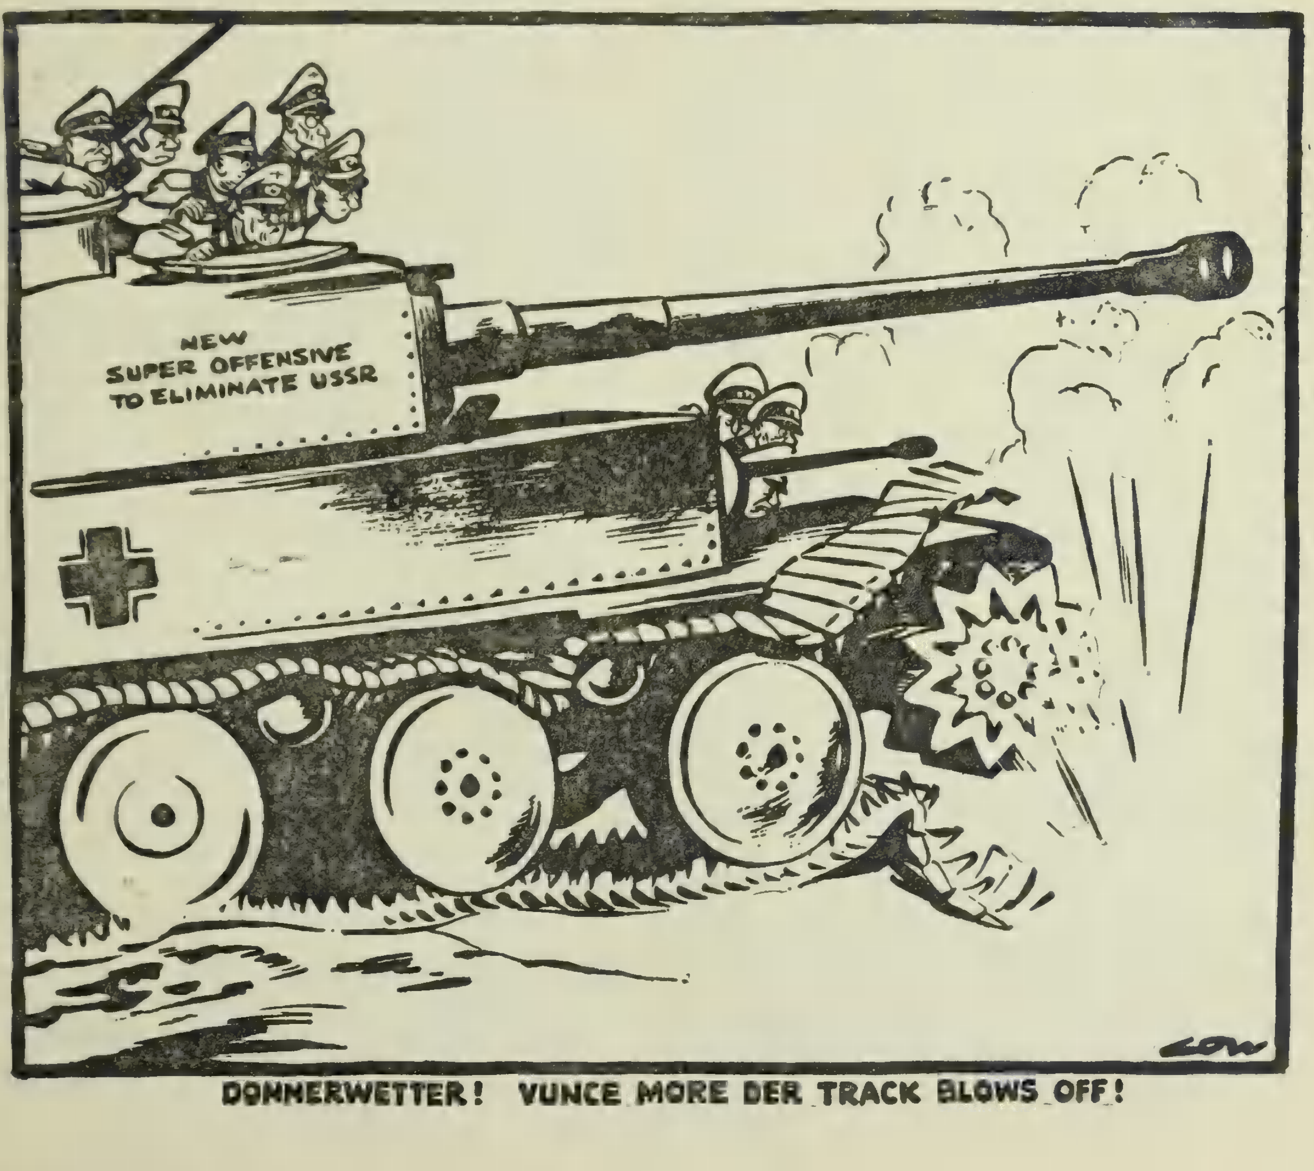
We should not imagine, however, that this phase of the war has been won. The Germans have abundant room in which to retreat. They have never given up except when convinced of the hopelessness of their position, and they have usually required a great deal of convincing. The skill of their commanders was demonstrated last March when, after experiencing a bad defeat, they extricated their troops from a position in which they could easily have met a major disaster.



DONNERWETTER! VUNCE MORE DER TRACK BLOWS OFF!

Nevertheless, they are in a most difficult strategic situation. Several courses are open to Hitler: (1) he can throw everything into a full-scale attack on Russia designed to destroy the Red Army and win the war on that one front; (2) he can make local attacks with the object of harassing the Russians and keeping them from launching their own offensive; (3) he can attempt merely to hold his ground in the east while swinging all his available forces to meet an expected Anglo-American attack in the west; (4) he can execute a planned retreat to prepared positions well back of the present front; or (5) the decision may be taken out of his hands by concerted action of his foes.

An all-out attack would require him to employ all available reserves at a time when the shortage of man-power has become a pressing German problem. And unless the Anglo-American armies first commit themselves to campaigning in an area where they are not likely to hurt Hitler greatly, they would then have a good chance of beating Germany in the west. Yet German national psychology demands an attack, and attack offers the only chance of winning with waning forces against foes steadily increasing in strength.

The concentration of about half of Germany's 218 divisions on the central front has suggested to some a coming attack in the Orel-Belgorod sector, a push through Voronezh, and then an attempt to take Moscow from the south. The German hope here—a faint one—would be that the Red Army would be so crippled by an unsuccessful defense as to lose much of its immediate offensive possibilities; the taking of Moscow, of course, would injure both the national morale and the industrial power of the Soviet Union. An offensive of this size, however, would involve large numbers of men and presumably entail heavy losses.

An attempt merely to hold present gains would not offer much hope of a German victory, for the offensive strength of the Red Army is now well developed. In the winter of 1941 the Germans held large areas with numerically inferior forces, but an attempt to do the same thing against improved Russian tactics in 1942 brought crushing defeats.

The only course which will give the Germans a chance to concentrate most of their forces in the west is rapid but well-prepared retreat. This would trade territory for time and delay a real Russian offensive until new transport lines could be set up. It would probably afford Hitler two or three months in which to work in the west. But it would also bring Russian bombers closer to western Germany and probably have a serious effect on German morale. It would, indeed, be interpreted as a clear admission of defeat.

It is to be hoped that even this choice between undesirable alternatives will not be left to Hitler. He must not be allowed to decide whether to concentrate his forces in the east or the west. The war has reached a stage comparable to 1918 in World War I, and we should this summer strike blows which will bring measurably closer the complete defeat of fascism.

Great Britain's Post-War Role

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

London, June 7

IN BRITAIN as in America you find a good deal of apprehension about the fact that no one seems to be dealing with the problems of post-war reconstruction in a large way. It is generally assumed that Mr. Eden, both by virtue of his office and by predilection, is sketching some general plans for the partnership of the United Nations after the war. But nothing sufficiently definite to stir the public imagination has yet emerged.

This does not mean that Britons are anxious for some Woodrow Wilson to rise up with a plan for a new League of Nations. They are skeptical of general schemes of world order, not only because their own historical approach is incompatible with too ambitious blueprints, but also because they fear that American "idealists" might present them with some ideal scheme which American "realists" might again repudiate. Interest in what America will do after the war and anxious inquiry about the danger of a new withdrawal greet the American visitor on every hand. American isolationists may interpret this interest as a betrayal of Britain's desire to have help in its European problems. I should say, rather, that it springs from a very realistic and essentially moral understanding of the world situation. This understanding includes recognition of the fact that the world must achieve some kind of stable order, that such an order requires more than the old balance-of-power strategy, and that no one nation is able to establish it.

Among those who think seriously of post-war issues there is quite general agreement that Britain may find its most creative role in post-war politics in acting as a broker between Russia and America in the triumvirate of nations which are bound to be preponderant in the post-war world. China may be excluded for the moment because its latent power will be exerted in Asia alone.

The big question is how intimately and mutually these three great nations may work out their common problems. I find the British attitude toward this great task promising because it seems to be in accord with the realities. The British are, for instance, in no mood to make a choice between an American or a Russian partnership. Reasons of national self-interest would deter them, because they know very well that without Russia a partnership with America would give them the role of a very junior member in the firm, while a partnership with Russia alone would expose them to various pressures which might prove extremely embarrassing. It is obvious that the three powers must hold together to form a nucleus for a world organization; it is also obvious that Britain is geographically and otherwise best able to act as an equilibrator of the partnership. For though Russian mistrust of the West remains, Anglo-Russian friendship has gone much farther toward dissipating it than anything we have done or can do for some time.

That Britain is closer to us than Russia is, is a truism. From one perspective the real gulf is between the Anglo-Saxon, democratic, bourgeois, quasi-Christian, and quasi-liberal world and the vast empire which is being reared upon the foundation of Communist religion. The gulf is deep even though Russia is patently anxious to disavow any part of the Communist creed which brings it into too overt conflict with the West. That Britain is closer to Russia than we are may require some proof. The geographical relation is obvious enough. They are both quasi-European powers with their heads in Europe and their limbs sprawled over other continents. But this common interest in Europe is less likely to lead to conflict than many have surmised, primarily because Russia gives no indication of desiring an active part in Continental reconstruction.

It will of course exercise the power of veto over any arrangements which would place actively anti-Communist or anti-Russian forces in control of the Continent. And on this score it is, not without reason, more fearful of our policy than of Britain's. But Russia's desire to rebuild its own land in peace and security will be the dominant motive of all its policies, and that task will absorb its resources for a long while to come. The devastation in Russia has been underestimated in America, though the pleas for help in securing food supplies made by the Soviet delegates at the Hot Springs conference may have given an inkling of the true state of affairs.

I do not pretend to know—and I have found no one who does know—what Russia will do about the various radical ferments and revolutions which are bound to break out in Europe. But it is a fairly safe guess that it will not encourage them unless it is obliged to frustrate attempts at a reactionary solution of the Continental problem. One contribution which the Soviets will probably make toward the peace will be to oppose the dismemberment of Germany, a policy ominously favored by certain circles in both Anglo-Saxon countries.

The British-Russian affinity, beyond the geographic fact, depends upon several factors, some historical and some consciously contrived. Among the latter must be mentioned the facilities for exchange of news and cultural information between the two countries, which so far go beyond anything we know in America. One finds here Russian exhibits of many kinds in great profusion. The sense of partnership with Russia in the immediate struggle is much more intense than with us, having been fostered by two years of relief from the air war which devastated British cities.

Among the historical factors a politico-economic and a cultural one deserve mention. Britain is a capitalist, not a Communist, nation; there is little prospect even of labor gaining control after the war. Nevertheless, Britain has accepted not only planning but the prospect of increasing government control of economic processes with a unanimity quite inconceivable in America. The difference in temper upon this point is best illustrated by the attitude of our two nations toward war-time restrictions. In Britain food rationing is accepted with an enthusiasm which strikes an American, accustomed to grousing upon the subject, as remarkable. I do not know how often I have heard the hope expressed that some kind of rationing will continue after the war. The reason given is that it is just. The sense of equality between rich and poor that it creates, the feeling of the poor that the rich have no advantage over them, is constantly expressed. (The equality is not perfect, as you may note when you eat at the Savoy or the Dorchester. But there is basic equality.)

Though Britain has not finally concluded the debate on planning, which indeed will proceed throughout the whole world for decades to come, it has arrived at conclusions about minimal standards of social control which will continue to arouse acute controversy among us and between us and the Russians. Here Britain quite obviously occupies the middle ground.

The cultural factor worth mentioning is that though in Britain as in America the atheism of Russia is a hazard to a partnership, the Catholic church is much less powerful in Britain than in America. I do not mean that only Catholics are concerned about this issue. But they have an idée-fixe upon this subject, and most Protestants do not. In Britain there is a strong inclination to let history take its course and to hope that every kind of freedom in Russia, including religious freedom, will have more chance if Russia is in partnership with us than if it is in conflict. The strong social interests of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Temple, and his great prudence in this matter help to set the tone of religious Britain.

On one question there is a sharp difference between political and religious opinion, and that is the future of the Baltic states, which Russia claims as part of its defense system. In political circles there is an inclination to yield this point, but influential churchmen hope that some effort will be made to secure at least cultural (religious) autonomy for the Baltic countries.

I would not claim that the role of mediator and equilibrator for Britain is consciously projected by any large British public. But I have met the idea with significant frequency among thoughtful people. And the historical facts seem to give it real validity and promise. It will take "a bit of doing." But if it can be carried out, it will obviously furnish that accord between self-interest and general interest which it must be the design of statesmanship to achieve. There is every indication that Russia would welcome such a three-cornered partnership. Surely it would be to our advantage also, though it will be some time before we know whether America appreciates that fact with any degree of unanimity.

America's Pampered Husbands

BY EDITH M. STERN

AS A disillusioned feminist (from the twenties) I have followed with interest the contradictions and confusions in the press and radio campaign to recruit women for war industry. Women are praised to the skies because so many of them have entered war plants; but the situation is serious because so many more women are needed. Women with small children shouldn't work in war plants; but communities should provide nurseries so women with small children can do so. We must cut down on laundry service, restaurants, and store deliveries to release people for war work; but housewives should take full-time employment in war plants. It's marvelous how women used to only such light work as washing windows, turning double-bed mattresses, scrubbing floors, and hanging up wet sheets are holding up at machines, and how the feminine hands that hitherto touched nothing unlovelier than garbage or soiled diapers dip without squeamishness into grease and oil. And so on.

Out of all the bunkum and inconsistencies a few clear facts emerge: that the supply of regular working girls and women—drawn from beauty parlors or schoolrooms or offices or restaurants or other people's kitchens—is pretty well exhausted; that the 3,000,000 additional women needed in war industry this year will have to be recruited among housewives; that the appeals—effective at first—of patriotism, high wages, and glamor by way of pictures of Powers-model welders aren't making housewives en masse exchange their bungalow aprons for slacks; and that if we aren't going to lose this war for lack of woman power, something will have to be done, not about women, but about men.

For the unorganized but powerful pressure group of American husbands is the greatest obstacle to all-out employment of middle-class American wives. It isn't only, as a recent Gallup poll showed, that there are more married women who are unqualifiedly willing to take full-time employment in war plants than married men who are unqualifiedly willing to have their wives take such employment. Husbandly pressure on housewives not to enlist for the war-production front takes much subtler forms than an overt "I object." Largely, it shapes up as men's time-hallowed, unspoken refusal to share in home responsibilities, an attitude that puts an intolerable double burden on the working wife.

Women who are doing men's work in war plants today are doing men's work and women's work. The costs in physical and nervous energy have not yet been reckoned, but if we expect more women to volunteer for men's traditional work, more men must take over some of women's traditional work.

Not a hint of this clear-cut solution for a grave problem has crept into any of the women-in-war-industry discussions I have examined. An article in the February Fortune pointed out that even when there are provisions for care of the children, the working mother must still market, cook, launder, and clean. "These [activities] stretch her working day another four to six hours unless she receives concessions not normally given." That her husband might make some of the concessions is not suggested.

At that, Fortune is more realistic than most of its contemporaries. In the Ladies' Home Journal and This Week blithe gurglings have glorified the woman with a double job, have shown how merrily war-working mothers find time to do the family washing at night and to decorate birthday cakes as usual. But what housewife in her right mind, now comfortably supported by her husband and satisfying her patriotic urges by Red Cross work and by collecting silk stockings and fats and tin cans, would want to change places with welder Annie James, recently so enthusiastically pictured in the Reader's Digest?

Annie, we are told, thrives "on the combination of home and job. . . . Every day except Sunday . . . there is a hectic period between 4:20, when Annie comes home, and 4:40, when her husband leaves for his night shift in a metal company. In that twenty minutes her husband eats his dinner (he won't eat until she comes home), and she prepares his midnight lunch (it doesn't taste good otherwise)." Touching, of course, that Annie's husband is so devoted. But since they both work the same number of hours, at equally heavy work, it is conceivable that Mr. James might, occasionally, eat and clean up before Annie returns, or take turns fixing Annie's lunch for her. "After he leaves," the paean runs on, "she does the housework."

Annie, who has adolescent children, was described in happy contrast to Mrs. Meng, mother of a four-year-old. She "had just finished the supper dishes when I arrived. She looked near the breaking-point. . . . Her young husband seemed worried about her." But if he helped her with the supper dishes, the article failed to mention it.

Even when the services that the average wife performs in the average household don't involve much time or physical labor, even where a servant can be obtained and held, home-making minutiae are distracting and energy-draining. When household equipment needs replacement, when the children's shoe size changes, when the toothpaste runs out, it is Mother and not Father who scribbles memoranda on scraps of paper and squeezes in the necessary shopping sometime, somewhere. Trivia? Maybe. But more women would be ready to take on full-time outside employment if they had the assurance that such trivia would not devolve exclusively upon them.

Why can't a father escort youngsters to the doctor or the dentist? Are consultations with teacher something that requires only that feminine touch now needed at grinders? If a woman can learn to run a drill press, why can't a man learn to run a washing-machine or an electric mangle? In short, if women must by war necessity work outside the home, isn't it equally a war necessity that men work inside?

It is evident that men, however much they pooh-pooh housework, however loudly they proclaim, "Women make too much fuss about it" or "I could do it with one hand tied behind my back," are fully aware of the extent of the services rendered to them by their wives. If they were not, they would not so diligently rationalize their desire to keep the little woman at home. The work might be too heavy for her, for instance—though for years she has done heavy cleaning, washed kitchen walls, climbed up and down stepladders, lugged heavy coats up to the attic in summer and lugged them down again in winter. She might become tired—though she has sat up night after night with sick children while he slept, and has given him his breakfast as usual in the morning. It might not be safe—regardless of the fact that most accidents occur in homes, not in factories.

Underlying his unprecedented consideration for his wife is John Doe's unconscious fear that life would be less comfortable for him if Jane Doe were tied up in a war plant eight hours a day. And this fear is transmitted to Jane Doe. She has been so well schooled in her duties to her husband, by him, by her mother, by her grandmother, and by the women's magazines, that she would consider herself derelict if she let up on her home-making merely because she works as hard as he does. She does not envision exchanging a mop for a drill press, but tending a drill press for eight hours a day and wielding the mop before or after shifts.

So for the present, since John is able to support her, she is settling for the mop, thank you. And you can't blame her. It is not that she doesn't want to help win the war, or that she prefers housework to shop work. She realizes that there are gaiety and sociability in a shop never found in her solitary kitchen; no iceman comes in nowadays, and even the Fuller brush boys have been drafted. She is thoroughly aware that eight hours a day at a machine is less exhausting than twelve hours at domestic drudgery. Simply, and mathematically, she realizes that she has the strength of only one person, and that there are only twenty-four hours in a day.

Two people, however, have the strength of two, and their combined hours equal forty-eight. Pulling together, wives and husbands can work both outside and inside the home. If pampered males would take on more homemaking responsibilities, the American home would be not disrupted but strengthened. A new, genuine companionship would develop between husbands and wives, now separated by divergent, sex-bounded interests. Children would benefit from father-care as well as mother-care. The point is proved by the experience of the professional classes, where "man's work" and "woman's work" are not nearly so rigidly defined as in other groups. Many a career woman can testify that all she is and hopes to be she owes to her "angel husband," who trots Johnny to the shoestore when she has an important business appointment and helps with the dishes when she is just as tired as he is.

The task of reeducating men to a new role in the home will not be an easy one. It is, however, an essential task if we hope to induce women to volunteer for war industry or if we are going to draft them without destroying them. A nation becoming accustomed to rationing, to doing without a car, and to casualty lists should not find the difficulty insuperable. Indeed, it must not, or we shall deliver too little and too late!

EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Argentina Buries Democracy

[Rightly concerned about developments in the Argentine, both press and radio in the United States continue to watch closely every move Ramirez makes. It cost no great effort to unmask him and his associates in their pretended support of inter-American solidarity. By now everybody knows that their sympathies have been and remain with the Axis and that should they break off diplomatic relations with Berlin it would only be in order to compete with their neighbors in the enjoyment of lend-lease. The new government's disregard for the constitution became evident through the dissolution of Congress and the "postponement" of the fall elections. Less known is the positive political program for which it stands. The articles which follow, by John W. White, for many years correspondent for American newspapers in Buenos Aires, and Manuel Seoane, editor of the Ercilla, of Santiago, Chile, give a complete picture of the fascism that has installed itself on the River Plata, menacing not only South America but the entire hemisphere.]

Blueprint for a Fascist Utopia

BY JOHN W. WHITE

SOME TIME ago General Pedro P. Ramirez and his Nationalist Party formulated a "minimum program of action" for the assassination and burial of democracy in Argentina, and since the General's accession to power they have begun to put it in operation. This blueprint for a fascist Utopia was published in pamphlet form and distributed among members of the Nationalist militia throughout the country. I have a copy in my possession and have used it as the basis for the following account of Argentine fascism.

The first item on the program provides for the dissolution of all three branches of the democratic state—executive, legislative, and judicial. This was the first action taken by the new military government. It eliminated the executive branch by forcing Castillo to resign, the legislative by dissolving Congress, and the judicial by establishing martial law.

Argentina's Nationalist movement makes the familiar fascist plea that democracy has failed to solve the country's economic problems. Its persuasive propaganda seeks to create a mass movement of discontent, especially among the rapidly growing middle class, and to justify the need for rule by force. At the same time, it is attempting to convert democratic-minded Argentines to new ideas. The Rights of Man "as proclaimed by the leftist hordes" are to be supplanted by "the obligation of the citizen toward society and the state." "Society has no duties toward the individual; it has only powers." It may recognize certain rights of the individual on the condition of his "unqualified acceptance of certain duties to the state." "The liberty of conscience in democracy is nothing more or less than the liberty of rebellion in anarchy."

Leaders of the Nationalist movement do not allow their followers to forget for a moment the words spoken by General Uriburu, leader of the 1930 revolt, to the officers who supported him: "The revolution was directed against a system, not a party." Argentina's Nationalists are pledged to carry on Uriburu's fascist revolution until they have supplanted democracy by a corporative state, a replica of the one set up by Mussolini.

All political parties are to be abolished. The vote will not be a right of citizenship but of economic functions. The energy now expended in political controversy is to be dedicated to the advancement and progress of the community. Jews and Communists will be "handled with a maximum of energy," an Argentine euphemism for "liquidated."

A close relationship will be maintained between the schools and the military; the military training of the child is to begin in the primary grades. The army is to be greatly enlarged and so trained that it can take over the operation of industries, especially those owned by foreigners, whenever that step is considered desirable. The state will recognize and foster the existence of volunteer militias for "the formation of the national consciousness"—that is, for the intimidation of civilians.

The new corporative state is to be based on seven corporation councils, or guilds, similar to the twenty-two which Mussolini created. Commerce, communications, agriculture, cattle-raising, trade and industry, banking and insurance, and the arts and professions are each to form a guild. These are to be represented on a unicameral National Council of Corporations which will replace Congress and permit the new state to direct Argentina's economic destiny. "We want a state," the program says, "in which the agrarian organization shall respond to the interests of the country and not be subject to foreign economic interests"—meaning the American and British packing plants.

Although the Nationalist appeal is directed to the habitual discontent of the middle class, the program embodies all the well-known aspirations of the wealthy cattle barons and absentee landlords who are financing the movement and who will be the only gainers from the establishment of a corporative state. "Nationalism proposes a state based on the active elements of the national community and the interdependence of individual interests," the blueprint states. By these "active elements" are meant the cattle interests and the landlords, who usually refer to themselves as the "live forces" of the community. The "interdependence of individual interests" means the subordination of the interests of everyone else to those of the rulers of the country.

The Argentine conservatives know that they must kill democracy or lose for all time their control of the government. The vote-conscious masses in Argentina are democrats, and they have become too numerous for the security of the conservatives. Organized labor is one of the "leftist" democratic forces which the new state proposes to suppress. Relations between capital and labor will be similar to those prevailing in Italy under Mussolini's "Charter of Labor." The state will guarantee harmony between capital and labor by the simple means of prohibiting strikes, lockouts, and other forms of class struggle. Disputes which cannot be settled by the guilds will be decided by labor courts from whose rulings there will be no appeal.

It is significant that the leaders of the Nationalist Party are men who have failed in politics or in their chosen careers, or army officers who in their impressionable youth were attached to the Germany army. The blueprint of the new state holds out special bait to tempt frustrated individuals into the haven of the Nationalist movement. In each guild, for instance, capital, labor, and technicians are to have an equal number of representatives, the inclusion of technicians being for the purpose of attracting dissatisfied young agrarians, accountants, chemists, geologists, and the like by giving them a voice in the government. These young men form the backbone of the civic militias which are preparing the way for the new state. The leaders of the Nationalist movement have restored to them their self-respect by supplying the uniform, the club, and the gun which enable them to beat up those who disagree with them.

Argentina's New Rulers

BY MANUEL SEOANE

Santiago, Chile, June 15

THE military revolt which broke out in Argentina on the first of the month was the second step in a long process. In September, 1930, when General Uriburu came to power through a coup d'état, Argentina, an exemplary democracy, fell under the sway of a group of military men who were anxious to end the influence of popular parties and to impose their will upon the country. Uriburu was a fascist—self-confessed and self-convicted. But, sure of his mastery over the popular mind, he announced an election, and his unexpected defeat reopened the doors of the Casa Rosada to the civil political parties.

Thirteen years later his comrades in arms sought the complete realization of their dream. Reactionary as he was, Castillo did not satisfy them. Though he was friendly to the Axis, he was a weak executive, and they feared he would be unable to prevent the Radical Party and other forces of the left from participating again in the conduct of public affairs. The generals, trained by German officers and steeped in Nazi ideology, recognized the force of the fascist principle that power cannot be shared with weak, irresolute men. So on June 4 they deposed Castillo and set up a government dedicated to the establishment of a real fascist regime.

Their fascism, however, does not blind them to the fact that the military star of the Axis is waning. They see that outwardly they must give some support to the cause of the United Nations if Argentina is to be accepted into the inter-American order. But they believe it is possible to combine fascism at home and democracy abroad. Allied diplomacy has made it possible. If Vargas and Trujillo enjoy the full favor of Washington, why should General Ramirez be less fortunate?

The internal policy of the generals is as clear as spring water. The lessons of the past have been well learned. I am willing to wager that the September elections will not take place. As he gains in strength, Ramirez will eliminate political parties, one by one. He will organize his own shock troops; he is well prepared to do so. It was he who, together with General Juan Bautista Molina, one of the most thoroughgoing fascists in Argentina, organized the Milicia Nacionalista, later known as the Guardia Nacional, the vanguard of Argentine fascism. In December, 1942, the Guardia Nacional joined with the Unión Nacional Argentina to form the first totalitarian party of the country, the party of the Recuperación Nacional. Now that he is head of the government, Ramirez has only to follow the road he mapped earlier. He will be supported by the reactionary clique which imposed his appointment as Minister of War upon Castillo. These include the influential former governor of Buenos Aires, Manuel Fresco, so-called "Duce" of Argentina; former Senator Sanchez Sorondo; and Carlos Ibarguren, the biographer of the tyrant Rosas.

Strange that in the midst of the great crusade fo freedom a new dictatorship should come into being in Latin America! Stranger still that Latin American dicta tors should be welcomed in Washington and honore by American universities! President Peñaranda of Bolivi makes a triumphal visit to the United States and is fol lowed by Moriñigo of Paraguay. Will the illustriou President of Honduras and the "great liberal" of Guate mala be the next? The people of the United States—th onest citizens, the common men—seem unaware of the rofound disorientation, the unutterable disappointment perienced by the peoples of Latin America.

The Latin American dictators, of whom Ramirez is nly the newest, are an affront to the cause of the United ations and a menace to the future peace of America. ith the money and arms they are receiving from the senal of democracy they are preparing new conflicts. eneral Peñaranda said not long ago that Bolivian claims a port will be presented after the war, "at the first ropitious opportunity." The Argentine military men ow in power consider it one of their most sacred tasks crush Brazil.

Only a policy of real inter-American democratic co-peration can insure freedom and peace for tomorrow. rgentina's new rulers will offer one of the greatest stacles to such a policy.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE Führer never makes a mistake" was the Nazi slogan in the seven fat years. Those days are past. n June 19 Goebbels wrote in his weekly article, "Only e most overweening people think that they are above istakes." He put in a plea for "the sovereign right of casionally being wrong" and defended the Nazi gov-nment against a "widely current" reproach. "The Ger-an people have an idea," he said, "that the government one must be denied the right to make mistakes. Cer-in elements demand not only that it should analyze the esent situation correctly but that it should be able to redict the future. That is asking too much. It is an ex-nple of the over-objectivity of certain sanctimonious ruth fanatics' among us who pardon a foreign govern-ent every mistake lest they do it an injustice but never verlook an error of their own government's."

The Herr Minister's defense was along three lines. irst, there had not been many false announcements. "It nnot be disputed that the German government has ade very few false prognoses. . . . We have certainly on victories we had not predicted more often than we ave failed to win victories we had predicted." Secondly, any false announcements were made to confuse the emy. "That is an allowable deception and often brings ccess. Of course it is done at the expense of the gen-al credibility of news reports, but the device must evertheless be used. . . . Not everything that the public ow considers a mistake on the part of the leadership as really a mistake. In many cases it was part of the war nerves." Thirdly, many seemingly false announce-ents will finally be confirmed—for the present, silence ust be preserved. "The enemy must be given no information. The disadvantages we suffer always get out and are often made to appear greater than they are; the rumor-mongers see to that. Our advantages, on the other hand, must often be concealed as war secrets. This puts the government in an extremely unfavorable position with respect to pulbic opinion."

It was a real defense plea. The Propaganda Minister tried to clear his government of the charge of having careened from mistake to mistake, from boast to boast, from lie to lie. What is most interesting about the attempt is the inference to be drawn from it—that the accusation must have been strongly pressed.

About the middle of June German internal propaganda completely changed its tactics about the air raids. Instead of discreetly soft-pedaling the subject, it now assails the public with unvarnished descriptions of the destruction and suffering in the afflicted provinces. The reason for the change was not immediately clear, but at least a contributing cause was the necessity of arousing more sympathy for the victims, great crowds of whom are being evacuated. It is an old complaint that they have not been received very cordially in the districts to which they have been removed. Recently this attitude must have crystallized into outspoken dislike.

"Our fellow-citizens in the most heavily bombed towns believe themselves deserted or forgotten, at any rate not understood," admonished radio commentator Fritzsche on June 19. "They see little evidence of a real desire to help them in the untouched regions." The Essener Nationalzeitung, which has long devoted itself to this theme, on June 11 instanced several cases. The father of an Essen man had got lodging for him and his family in the father's town. The local authorities, however, refused to issue the necessary permit. An official of the National Socialist Party was arrested in Bochum because he turned out four women and two children who had been quartered in his house. A man in the country to whom some "pitiful évacués" had been brought burst out in a frenzy: "What do these strangers want? I've already said I had no room. Get out!" He also was arrested.

The May number of the Austrian Rundschau describes the reception that 1,200 mothers and 5,200 children from Duisberg met in the province of Styria. It was so hostile that Gauleiter Uberreither issued a proclamation warning innkeepers, artisans, and shopkeepers that if they continued to be disagreeable to the évacués their houses and shops would be closed. It is not surprising that under such circumstances evacuation seems to many a worse fate than being bombed. The Völkische Beobachter of June 21 noted that 10,000 persons who no longer had a roof over their head refused, nevertheless, to leave the town. Rather than be transplanted to a hostile world, they live in cellars and holes under the ruins.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Devil in the Piece

THE TRAGEDY OF EUROPEAN LABOR, 1918-1939. By Adolf Sturmthal. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

OF THE great heap of books on the European disaster very few have dealt with labor's responsibility for what happened, and these few have been polemical works by sectarian thinkers, designed to show that the collapse was due to the other fellow's mistaken theories about reform or revolution or what-not. Dr. Sturmthal makes a sustained and documented effort to analyze not only what happened in terms of a general theory of fascism, but to put forward a reasoned theory of labor action. This reviewer, who does not accept the Otto Bauer theory of the origin of fascism which the author uses, nevertheless believes this to be the best account of labor history during the great inter-war crisis that has yet appeared. It is less sectarian than John Strachey's books and far more searching than Mr. Laski's extended pamphlets. The excellence of Dr. Sturmthal's surveys alone, apart from his theory, should win for the author the attention of serious men.

Fascism, according to Bauer, comes into existence when there is a balance of class forces neither of which is strong enough to defeat the other. As a result of stalemate and disruption, the masses, and particularly the middle class, then turn to fascism. And, adds Dr. Sturmthal with greater credibility, fascism is born when the labor movement, confronted with such a social crisis, confines itself to what he calls pressure-group politics. Pressure politics, indeed, is the devil in the miracle play. Confine him in the dungeon beneath the stage and before long he leaps up again with a mocking laugh. And this devil is not to be exorcised by merely switching one's allegiance from the reformist to the so-called revolutionary parties, for these latter parties have also thought in terms of pressure rather than of preparing a daring reconstruction of society. By pressure politics the author means, of course, representation in Parliament or strike action in the field that is designed to resist the demands of the employing classes or to improve popular conditions within the existing social order or within the limits of accepted fiscal policy. Dr. Sturmthal, as an expansionist economist of the Swedish school, urges upon the American and European labor movement a consideration of the modest success which Swedish labor achieved. He is not dogmatic about this, however, and perhaps he would agree that expansionist policies are appropriate to countries which have a politically developed agricultural class ready to ally itself with labor, and in which the capitalist forces are relatively weak.

But just as one does not need to accept the Bauer theory of fascism, so one can fully recognize the merits of the author's treatise without being an expansionist economist. For what Dr. Sturmthal does establish is that in great measure the victories of fascism were due to labor's unwillingness to govern, and its disinclination to apply its own proposed remedies, revolutionary or reformist, when in power or office. The example of the British Labor Party will suffice. "It made the mistake," as Laski has said, "of seeking to survive by accepting a Liberal tradition which was already obsolete Under Mr. MacDonald's leadership, it sought merely to extend the boundaries of social reform. When it made the treatment of the unemployed, instead of the reconstruction of industrial organization, the pivot of its domestic policy it was in grave danger of assuming that a mere policy of cash concessions to the under-dog would suffice to win popularity for it." The consequence was that the Labor Cabinet split and a group of its most important leaders, following the logic of their thought, went over to the party which really believe in capitalism.

One of the most original contributions which Dr. Sturmthal makes is his description of European revolutionary parties as merely radical. He is by no means prejudiced against any particular party and recognizes the merits and demerits o them all. But he will not agree, for instance, that the Communist Party was a purely revolutionary organization, though the European debate usually assumed as much. Pinning it inner faith upon a total revolution which it never sought t prepare, the Communist Party could only make more radica demands upon capitalism than its competitors within th working-class movement. It was useless, for example, t shout "Airplanes for Spain" on the streets of Paris if on voted under all circumstances for M. Blum in the Chamber It was vain for the Communist Party of France to criticiz the unfortunate Blum for consenting to non-interventio when the party also urged him not to resign at the momen when resignation was the only means he had of making protest or a new start. And if it is right of the America Communist Party to soft-pedal social reform now and t oppose President Roosevelt's attempt to limit salaries t $25,000 a year, in the interest of unity, then it was wron to make such radical demands on the French bourgeoisie the French party did, when the only real problem of th European movement was how to aid the Spanish Republi

The conclusion that the author reaches, then, is not th all too common one that European labor went down into th pit because of its meddling with politics, but the contra one that it failed simply because it was not political enoug Strong enough to hinder the automatic operation of the o laws, powerful enough to keep a one-handed grip upon th machine which the capitalists hitherto had alone directe able to unsettle the conservative beliefs of millions, eve able to fire the imagination and win the loyalty of enormou followings, the European labor movement was fundamental a vast pressure group, hoping to preserve democracy in period when preservation meant total reconstruction. It pa for its lack of vision with its life.

With Dr. Sturmthal's detailed historical account of th crises that afflicted Europe this reviewer is in substanti agreement; yet it is inevitable that there should be som obscurity and some inadequacy. To me the least satisfacto chapters are those which deal with Great Britain and wi Spain, the two countries I know best. In both cases D rmthal has too great a readiness to rely merely upon cumentary evidence, as the following quotation proves to one who took part in the event it describes. Speaking of transformation of the Spanish popular militia into a ular army, Dr. Sturmthal writes, "After a few weeks sident Azaña began to organize a new army. The right- ng Socialists supported this move; so did the Commu- ts." The fact is that the necessity of a regular army was t recognized by the Communist Party of Spain, for a g time the only party earnestly supporting the October ree which it had persuaded the other parties of the Popu- Front to accept. The documents, of course, will sustain . Sturmthal's assertion. The future folklore of Madrid will ute it. Too often the European will feel himself whisked oss difficult spots by Dr. Sturmthal's too magisterial hand. t no other book deals so painstakingly with the role of or during the long crisis. Because it offers an excellent nplement to the work of writers, like Professor Schuman, o largely ignore public opinion, "The Tragedy of Euro- n Labor" is compulsory reading for liberals.

he Spirit of France

NAISSANCE. Revue Trimestrielle publiée par l'Ecole Libres des Hautes Etudes, New York. Vol. I, Nos. 1 and 2. $2.

HERE are few things in history more tragic than the hush that followed the downfall of France. The army ich had been, in D. W. Brogan's words, the shield and rd of freedom was annihilated; the ripest and most hu- ne of cultures was stilled.

n June 18, 1940, General de Gaulle sounded his clarion l, and Fighting France was born anew. Almost as swiftly France of the spirit resumed her place in the vanguard. first the army of De Gaulle was pitifully small; the little iews that appeared in London had a limited circle of ders. But the flame was kept alive.

radually Free France, Fighting France, had to be ac- owledged as the real France, the only one with which we ld deal without betraying our own ideal. And in the same the intellectual activities of the Free French grew in esion and vigor. Under Belgian and Free French auspices, h the generous cooperation of the New School for Social earch, an Ecole Libre des Hautes Etudes was created in w York. Henri Focillon, the historian of art, was its first sident. Its present head is the philosopher Jacques Mari- . The remarkable group of scholars gathered in this ool are now issuing a quarterly aptly called Renaissance. first volume, containing the January and June numbers, just been released.

enaissance is at the same time a scholarly, even an aca- ic, publication and a review of a more general character. the whole, an excellent balance has been maintained. hough some of the essays are erudite, none is abtrusely nical; and those which have the widest appeal are not pular" in the shallower sense of the term. The book re- ws are on a very high level. This is an epitome of a great ure which still provides pioneers in every field.

The Germans and Vichy unite, for their own purpose, in fostering the myth of French decadence; and some Americans have fallen victims to that insidious propaganda. There is no "decadence" in France except among the Quislings. France suffered heavily for our common sins of omission and commission. But her spirit was not broken, and the tradition of a thousand years is still bearing fruit. Of this indomitable life, Renaissance is the irrefutable manifestation. The magazine is disinterested, not polemical; it advances no claims. But by its very existence it reminds us of a fact which is blurred in the minds of many journalists and politicians: that without the full cooperation of France world culture would be mutilated and world order precarious.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Virginian Leonardo

JEFFERSON: THE ROAD TO GLORY (1743-1776). By Marie Kimball. Coward-McCann. $4.

TOO much cannot be written about Jefferson. As Mrs. Kimball makes clear in her preface, Jefferson has always been represented partially—in two senses of the word—and it is, I think, increasingly important for the fruitful knowledge of our own past that a difficult, complex, unstandardized figure like Jefferson should become better and better known. In addition to Albert Jay Nock's intelligent reworking of the nineteenth-century biographies and Mr. Mayo's more recent compilation of Jefferson's own words in biographical sequence, we need a detailed treatment which shall not be exclusively intimate, political, picturesque, or artistic but all of these and as much more as the subject requires. Mrs. Kimball, a tried researcher in Jefferson archives, puts the future encyclopedic biographer in her debt by giving him in this volume a great deal of new material and a number of new conclusions affecting the first half of Jefferson's career.

She makes plain, among other things, the important fact that her hero was a rich man, related by marriage and friendship to the ruling families of Virginia and designated by heredity for the task of government. The details she supplies restore the proper feeling for the conditions of American freedom and American independence. Our truest democrat before Lincoln was such by conviction and reflection; he was, in the cant phrase, "a traitor to his class"; and in all he said and did politically he was going against the current of established respectability, conservative right thinking, and safe courses.

It appears at the same time that in matters of thought, art, and belief Jefferson was a balanced mixture of classic and romantic, traditionalism and originality. Making his own way through the prevailing influences of the time, whether in gardening or political theory, Jefferson turned out to be a very precocious and self-assured uomo universale, a Virginian Leonardo, interested in all things but aloof and spiritually solitary, except perhaps for the ten years of his fortunate and happy marriage.

This, together with a very striking portrait of Patrick Henry, is the main contribution of Mrs. Kimball's learned pages. Unfortunately, it takes a little digging and reassembling to obtain. For her book is less an account of the first half of a man's life than a series of fourteen monographs c aspects of a nascent career. In truth, it is hard to discern tl writer's plan and intention, for she gives us, mainly abo Patrick Henry, passages of genuine historical writing-chronological order, balanced grouping of facts, and narr tive art. The rest, which is the bulk of the volume, is a ranged topically and neglects both proportion and narrati style. Secondary characters receive the same kind of attentic as the main figures: for instance, if the author mentions a unimportant clergyman and happens to know the dimensio of his church, the dimensions are set down. In the midst interesting substance we get three pages discussing the quali of paper and the form of handwriting in various portions Jefferson's diary. All this is important to the scholar and do not scorn it; but it is scaffolding, which should disappe from the finished edifice, or at most should be stowed aw in the sub-basement of footnotes. The common reader, ther fore, must be prepared to climb his way through much timb work in order to get rewarding glimpses of the surface a structure that interest him.

From the evident skill with which Mrs. Kimball has, the one hand, collected her materials and, on the other, co posed the revolutionary episodes starring Patrick Henry, o may hope that she will consider the present work a ske and source book preparing the way to the complete biograp she can and ought to produce. In that future work it is a to be hoped that certain ambiguities of expression and so slipshod phraseology that mar the present pages will avoided: they are bound to seem worse than they are in co trast to the high intelligence and felicitous writing of wh the author is capable.

MEN AND IDEAS: AN INFORMAL HISTORY
CHINESE POLITICAL THOUGHT. By Lin M

Random House. $3.95.

LIN YUTANG is known in China as a philologist and v

Outside of their surnames, and the fact that each is trying serve both China and the United States by popularizing C nese thought, the two authors have only their nationa and style manuals in common. Both use the partial refo for transliterating Chinese terms into Roman letters wl Dr. Lin Yutang has devised. This consists in retaining n of the old, standard Wade-Giles spelling of Chinese then running the words together. Thus Mo Tzu (pronour something like maw dz) is spelled "Motse." Book titles come such unidentifiable monstrosities as "Kuoku Lunhe or "Chungkuo Shehhuishih Lunchan," which no lay Ar can could pronounce without a Dr. Lin at his elbow. A from this irritating but unimportant idiosyncrasy, each w marks a major contribution to the field of Western pop writing about China.

The younger Dr. Lin has produced a general surve Chinese political thought which reveals the richness, ir ity, and variety of Chinese speculation about government. Fifteen major thinkers are presented. Each is labeled with a tag which orients him in terms of Western political thinking: "the metaphysical monarchist," "the sociological anarchist," and so on. The life of each thinker is given, together with a persuasively plain appraisal of his historical background and political role; the rest of each discussion is reconstruction—frequently brilliant—of the political theory in wholly Western terms. The job of transposing Chinese ideas and values into Western terms is at best a ticklish one. Dr. Lin proceeds with superb assurance and bold imagination. His work will stir up storms in many academic teacups, but it is apt to remain standard for some years as the first attempt, in a Western language, to outline the general development of Chinese political thinking.

Many Chinese theorists and treatises are here presented for the first time. The novice in Far Eastern studies will do well to seek parallel translations before relying too heavily on Lin Mousheng's characterizations, but the general reader may treat himself to the rare experience of entering fresh, new, hitherto unexplored fields of political ideas. "Men and Ideas" will excite any intelligent American with its revelation of Chinese political versatility. As a clear, popular summary of the stuff of Chinese political thinking, the work is an important datum for considering post-war China; obviously no people with such a past could drift into the absurdities of fascist dogma.

Lin Yutang's "The Wisdom of China and India" deals with wisdom only in the sense in which the term is employed by publishers. The omnibus is a magnificent hodge-podge, and constitutes first-class entertainment. Dr. Lin has literally shoveled in the material. The Indian section includes samples of Hindu and Buddhist writings, including some superb translations of the fiery, dogmatic sermons of Gautama; and it also includes, in toto, Sir Edwin Arnold's Victorian classic, "The Light of Asia." The Chinese section is equally odd, since the bulk of the selections is philosophical, but the concluding portion is made up of what Dr. Lin likes in modern Chinese fiction and belles-lettres. The fact that these works had already been translated by Lin Yutang but had been published only in fugitive bilingual editions by the West Wind Press of Shanghai may have influenced the editor into taking materials which he found accessible. The net effect is as though a compendium from Plato, Aristotle, Jesus, and Aquinas concluded with some of Poe's stories, favorite passages from the "Pickwick Papers," Bierce's epigrams, and Barbellion's "Journal of a Disappointed Man." The reader will get the biggest value per dollar which has been seen for a long time in the bookstores; and even scholars will buy the book because of its invaluable accessible reprints of much important material—with Lin Yutang's own translations not the least important.

Lin Yutang proceeds with ponderous archness to introduce the average American to both Chinese and Indian cultures. Only a literary masochist would read the book through from its beginning to the end on page 1,104, but there are few literate persons who could not find hours of enjoyment, some pleasures of new discovery, and a great deal of information in the volume. The anthology does bring China and India closer to Americans by introducing everything from PIONEER TO THE PAST: THE STORY OF JAMES HENRY BREASTED. By Charles Breasted. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

THE life of James Henry Breasted falls into a typically American pattern which for all its familiarity is not easy to understand. The qualities that made him a great Orientalist—unswerving determination, tremendous labor, vision—were accompanied by a growing sense of frustration in his personal life. He considered his personal life a failure; yet it was perhaps the recognition of that failure which spurred him on to greater achievement in his work. His emotion was indwelling; it was passive and inarticulate, characterized by renunciation, tenderness, and infinite patience. He wondered about the source of his own ambition and the confidence he inspired in others. The feeling of mystery concerning the "cunning laws" governing his own life and the life of ancient man continuously inflects his writings. There were times when he saw the reason for his loneliness in his choice of profession.

> The career of man down into Christian times—that is a fascinating study! . . . I can only study his early progress while regarding him in the mass. I cannot follow him into the ages of the development of the individual, when he discovers the worth of himself as a soul. This leaves unused in myself capabilities of comprehension and sympathy which I long to employ. I wonder if we get another chance somewhere else to do it all over again in the light of what we have learned here.

Breasted promised himself that before he was forty he would become the leading authority on Egyptian history, history based on the original monuments, not on German research. Behind that promise were the sacrifices and unquestioning faith of his family. He studied pharmacy for four years and worked as a prescription clerk until a spiritual crisis led him to the Chicago Theological Seminary. He soon abandoned his desire to preach the gospel and finally made his way to Berlin and Egyptology. The year he received his doctor's degree—his letter to his family describing the examination is very moving—he married and took his wife on an "epigraphic honeymoon" up the Nile in a dahabiyeh named Olga. Somehow that trip has a homely American quality which makes it seem for all the world as if they were floating down the Mississippi in a river boat.

Throughout his life he was fond of referring to himself as an Illinois prairie boy. He had that kind of melancholy homelessness, as if his personality were lost in incomprehensible vistas of space. The yearning is the same whether he is looking at the mountains of Wyoming or at the ruins of cities dead 5,000 years. Yet the man whose longing for a home was so profound built a house in Chicago designed after a Renaissance Italian villa. "It lacked," says Charles Breasted, "what my family needed above all else—the quality of sunlight."

Sharing with other Americans of his time the sense of living in an amorphous and traditionless present, he was impelled toward an all-embracing past, as if the past alone, being secure, could give meaning to the present. Breasted went back as far as it was possible to go in his search for the whole tradition of mankind. Moreover, he did not merely study the history of early civilizations; he discovered what never before had been known. And in the ancient beginnings, in the "New Past" as he called it, he found hope for the future—"an infinity of possibilities not even faintly suggested by the present!" His last look, "The Dawn of Conscience," expounds the belief that "the culmination of a developing universe is character"—the outcome of the struggle between the age-old passion for power and the new-born conscience.

But Breasted was not a philosopher, nor did he claim to be, and the far-off victory of character is a hope more fervent than confident. The utopian dreams were still a retreat from reality; neither past nor future could equal the life he failed to live in the present. As he grew older he was cast back into the arms of his own past. The man and his work merge in the illuminating anecdote of his discovery of an inscription of an ancient king. As he deciphered the name, a vision rose before him of a far-off Sunday school and a group of village boys who "with heads together over a Bible were struggling with the difficult proper names of an old Hebrew chronicle." And there was the name, carved nearly 3,000 years ago.

The heartbreaking battle to finance his expeditions, the curious story of the Cairo museum project, the exciting description of his 2,000-mile journey up the Nile, the strange history of Gracilla Smith and Salib Claudius—these are only a few of the extremely interesting chapters in Dr. Breasted's career. Particularly interesting in the light of events present and to come was his experience in the Near East in the post-war world of 1919-20. ("My God," said Lord Curzon, "to think that at such a time His Majesty's Minister of Foreign Affairs should have been ignorant of the facts you have brought me!") The hope in America which he found in Iraq and Syria embarrassed him; it assured his safety and his disillusion. Finally, I have never read a more fascinating account of the opening of King Tutenkhamon's tomb or of the astounding ramifications of that international episode at which both Charles Breasted and his father were present. It is amazing to learn, by the way, that to this day no scientific or even adequate treatment of the discovery has been published.

Charles Breasted has made scrupulous use of original biographical material. The fact that he shared so many of his father's experiences has enabled him to be beautifully, no stodgily, objective. He has also been wise enough not to exclude himself as the small boy puzzled at the peace and calm of other homes, who was never able to conquer, as his father was not able to understand, "the overwhelmingly depressing effect upon me of the dead world which was hi supreme inspiration." But most important are the depth and constraint of his understanding, which bring to life so unobtrusively his father's great kindliness.

Digest of Clausewitz

THE LIVING THOUGHTS OF CLAUSEWITZ. Presented by Lieutenant Colonel Joseph I. Greene. Longmans, Green and Company. $1.50.

VERY few works have had as great an influence on military thought as Clausewitz's monumental "On War." Military leaders and writers—Jackson, Foch, Moltke, Fuller, Schlieffen, and many others—have freely praised Clausewitz and admitted their reliance on him for basic ideas. The service regulations of our own and other armies quote him, often unconsciously to be sure because his teachings have become so much an accepted part of war doctrine that their origin is overlooked. Longmans, Green is to be congratulated for bringing out "The Living Thoughts of Clausewitz," thereby filling a definite need for a modern English translation of a great book long out of print and difficult to secure. This compact volume of some 200 pages provides an abbreviated but excellent version of the work of the great Prussian thinker on war.

In a short review one can only indicate very briefly its contents. It is divided into seven main sections: The Nature of War, Theory of War, Strategy, Offense and Defense, Plan of War, War and Politics, and Conclusions. These in turn are minutely subdivided. The whole book is logically organized, systematic and comprehensive in its treatment of each subject, profound in thought and at the same time lucid in expression. While occasional illustrations from the field of tactics are obsolete, the conclusions drawn from the studies of past wars, especially the wars of Napoleon, are substantially as sound as they were 150 years ago. The United Nations after the current war, for example, will do well to heed the warning that in war the result is not absolute: "The conquered state often sees in it only a passing evil which may be repaired in after times by political combinations."

WITH her second novel the author of "Young Man with a Horn" deserts the jam session for the life of the mind; what hot jazz there is in Dorothy Baker's "Trio" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.50) sounds, as it were, off stage. Based on a theme dear to Henry James—the impact upon an innocent American of a complicated European—"Trio" is set in a Western university town and among university people; it is even courageous with a certain amount of intelligent talk about the nineteenth-century poets. I find this a pleasant progression in a young writer, from jazz musicians to teachers of French literature, and I wish Mrs. Baker could have made the advance with both feet and a fully adventuring intellect. But it is precisely as a novel of the mind that "Trio" fails, and quite despite Mrs. Baker's intention and craft. It is an enormously readable book, swift and tight, polished to the point of brilliance, and plotted with the kind of dramatic suspense which makes it impossible, once you have opened to its first page, to put it down again without racing through to the end. And yet, almost in the measure that we are seduced by Mrs. Baker's craft, we feel betrayed, finally, by the essential poverty of her thought.

There is enough "mystery" in "Trio" to make one careful about giving away the plot, but I suppose it is all right to report that it is about two women in a homosexual relation, with trimmings. One woman is a cultivated Parisienne who is a professor of French literature, and the other a young American graduate student whom the French lady has taken under her elegant bat-like wing. Then there is a young man who falls in love with the American girl. The ensuing triangle is capable of an infinite variety of treatment, but unfortunately Mrs. Baker's approach is a good deal closer to Hollywood-Broadway than to James.

I mean this in several ways. In the first place, it is the stated intention of the author to mold her novel as closely as possible to the form of the drama: Mrs. Baker tells her story largely by action and dialogue, and she even goes so far as to divide her book into three parts, or acts, and to limit her cast of characters to three leads and her scene to two simple sets. But this strikes me as a kind of novelistic suicide: I keep wondering what virtues Mrs. Baker finds in the drama form to warrant the assimilation to it of the novel form. Suppose it does add pace to a story, it also imposes upon the novel an arbitrary and mechanical unity and robs it of the diversity which is its peculiar charm. Then, and this is exemplified in all Mrs. Baker's characters, there seems to be a blood connection between theater techniques and cliché notions of characters. Mrs. Baker's people are not people but Hollywood stencils. Her young American girl, for instance, goes through her harassing emotional experiences equipped with little more in the way of a characterization (I do not mean character) than a loose sweater, a string of pearls, and a lock of hair which needs constantly to be brushed back from her face. Ray MacKenzie, the young man of "Trio," is one of those sturdy independent types (he enters the story as a kitchen helper at a university tea) who turns out to be simply John Garfield without the sterling neurotic accent. In other words, for all that Mrs. Baker's book is supposed to be about educated people, it is really about a Girl, a Villainess, and the Boy who meets the Girl. And consequently the French poetry which is so much the concern of the two women might just as well be the secret plans in a Hitchcock movie.

Indeed, in all sorts of significant ways "Trio" reminds me of certain Hitchcock films. There is the same sense of the firm directorial hand slowly losing its grip, of the spacious opening so wide with promise and of the gaps closing without being filled, the same sense, at last, of having been profoundly cheated intellectually and emotionally, of having had your nerves twanged. There is the same craftiness about craft and the same assumption that an interest in psychopathology is equivalent to a deep understanding of human motive and conflict. The trap of the over-slick story—especially of the over-slick story of psychological horror masquerading as a story of psychological insight—seems to me to be a particularly bad trap for a young writer to fall into. If it is Mrs. Baker's notable writing talent which tempts her into it, perhaps she should be assured that some very fine novelists have for good reason been willing to rest in a less obvious technical proficiency.

IN BRIEF

A HUNDRETH SUNDRIE FLOWRES. By George Gascoigne. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by C. T. Prouty. University of Missouri Press. $2.50.

In this splendid reprint of the original edition of 1573 the Flowres still yield "sundrie sweete fauours of Tragical, Comical, and Morall Discourses, bothe pleasaunt and profitable to the well smellyng noses of learned Readers." Gascoigne, one of the most fascinating of early Elizabethan figures, by the very amplitude of his career—he was poet, dramatist, critic, moralist as well as soldier, adventurer, and courtier—beautifully demonstrates the accommodation of native English tradition to foreign Renaissance influence. Although most of the Flowres are transplanted from the formal Italian gardens of Petrarch and Ariosto, the lovely Lullabie and the charming And if I did what then? are as fragrant as ever. Especially interesting as an example of one of the first novels in English is a love story in prose and verse concerning the adventures of a courtier and his mistress and the means by which they at last succeed—"The coales were quicke, the woode was drie, & I began to toste"—"in accomplishing of common comfort."

TRAVELS IN AFGHANISTAN, 1937-1938. By E. F. Fox. The Macmillan Company. $4.

Mr. Fox, an American mining engineer, was employed by a firm of concessionaires to explore Afghanistan from end to end. The interest of his volume, to others than geographers, will lie in the author's vivid and sympathetic account of a very independent people. It should also be of use to military students in need of information about this mountainous buffer between British India and the U. S. S. R.

RECORDS

VICTOR'S June list offers the Bridal Chamber Duet from Act 3 of "Lohengrin," sung by Flagstad and Melchior with the Victor Symphony under McArthur (Set 897, $2.50 plus tax). The music is good early Wagner; but the important thing about the set is its superbly lifelike reproduction of one of the most phenomenally beautiful voices in history. The set also reminds us that it wasn't only her voice that made Flagstad remarkable, but also her musical feeling and taste in phrasing.

Bjoerling too delights us not only with one of the most beautiful tenor voices of recent years, but with the fine musical taste with which it is used in music like the fine E il sol dell' anima duet from "Rigoletto" and the trashy O soave fanciulla from "La Boheme" (11-8440, $1 plus tax). Hjoerdis Schymberg, the soprano who sings with him, has a voice which is agreeable in its lower range but gets quite acidulous higher up, more so in the "Boheme" duet than in the "Rigoletto." This may be due partly to the recording that gives Bjoerling's voice a metallic rasp or edge in fortissimo in the "Boheme" duet.

Decca's second volume in the Brunswick Collectors' Series (Set B-1001, $3.50) offers a group of performances recorded by Red Nichols. Four of them were done in July, 1930, with a group that included Jack Teagarden, Benny Goodman, Joe Sullivan, and Gene Krupa: "China Boy" and "Peg o' My Heart" (80004), "The Sheik of Araby" and "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble (80005). Of these "China Boy" has the most vitality as a group performance, and has two excellent choruses by Sullivan; but Goodman plays in the twittering-of-birds style that Panassié denounces in his recent book (which I'll get around to soon). It is surprising, in fact, to hear how poor in invention and bad in tone Goodman's playing is in these performances. On the other hand Teagarden is invariably excellent; and his playing and Sullivan's make "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble" and "The Sheik" worth listening to (the "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble" is not the performance originally issued by Brunswick, but one pressed from a second master). Two performances were recorded in April, 1929, with Teagarden, Goodman, and Krupa: "Indiana" (second master) and "Dinah" (80006), with excellent playing by Teagarden, and a good solo by Goodman in "Indiana" (which wavers in pitch in my copy). And two were done in February, 1930, with Teagarden, Jimmy Dorsey, and Krupa: "Tea for Two" and "I Want to Be Happy" (80007), of which the first is excessively slow and melting, but the second has exciting ensemble vitality. Dorsey's playing is facile, but his round, solid tone is a relief after Goodman's.

There is much more of that ensemble vitality to be heard in the 1928 performances of Jimmy Noone's Apex Club Orchestra reissued in another Brunswick volume (Set B-1006, $3.50): "Apex Blues" and "Sweet Lorraine" (second master) (80023), "I Know That You Know" and "Sweet Sue" (80024), "Four or Five Times" (second master) and "Every Evening" (80025), "Monday Date" and "Blues My Naughty Sweetie Gives to Me" (80026). Though I enjoy Noone's big, round, firm tone and powerful slow style in the two blues, and his rhythmically incisive florid style in "Every Evening" and "Monday Date," it is Earl Hines's playing that I find most exciting in these performances, especially in "Four or Five Times" and "Monday Date." It is, in fact, the only thing I like in "Sweet Lorraine" and "Sweet Sue."

Renewed requests for my opinion of sapphire needles lead me to quote from Stipulation No. 3644 signed by the Federal Trade Commission and the Electrovox Company concerning the Walco needle. The company agrees that it will not use the word "permanent" to describe the needle, or any other words "to convey the impression or belief that said devices are of such unlimited span of usefulness that they will continue or endure without fundamental change when employed for their designed uses"; and that it will not use the words "will not wear down records" to describe the results of use of the needle, or any statement "to cause the belief or impression that contact between a revolving record and the said needle will not cause impairment, as, for example, that due to wear of either the needle or record."

The fact is that ordinary records containing abrasive wear down even a diamond point, which is harder than a sapphire, and harder also than the miraculous metal alloys you have been reading about; and that a sufficiently worn jewel point will damage records. A jewel point should be used only in a specially designed light pickup of which it is an integral and permanent part; then the rate of wear is sufficiently slow. What should not be used is a jewel point on a needle that is inserted into the ordinary pickup weighing, say, two and a half ounces. With such a pickup nothing more "permanent" should be used than the chromium-tipped needle—a fresh one for each set of records; and the best thing to use is a fresh steel needle for each record-side.

Will Corporal G. L. Langley tell me where to address an answer to his letter?

ondon Carries on ear Sirs: I met a young American the her day who had just come over and as looking rather beautiful in his pale ousers and darker coat. He was all thusiasm and was praying for a little ombing! To be without a blitz seemed him to have lived in vain, or at least have crossed the Atlantic in vain.

e begged him to stop, pointing to ndry ruins about us, explaining that r own house had been blasted, and sisting that it really wasn't so jolly hile it was happening; but he evi-ently did something about it, for last eek we had an alarm or two every ight while the full moon lasted.

The description by the Germans of eir grand new bombs and the terror ith which London received them is, owever, rather the measure of German ropaganda. Most of us slept in our eds very peacefully, and only a few tlying parts received attention from e Germans. Bombs are bombs, even they are few, and these of course nashed up some houses, but the only ightening thing about these propaanda raids over nearly all London has een the row made by our own barrage.
hat is stupendous, especially the ockets, which make a noise going up ke that of bombs coming down—only uch more so. I was praying that there ight not be a raid on Friday night, hich is my fire night, since in any case rning out at three in the morning is nuisance, but just as I was thinking was all right and they wouldn't come, ff went the siren and out I had to turn nd, with a companion, go and watch e Embankment. For five minutes the oise was deafening—all our own stuff
-and the sky was pricked with what oked like little sparks. Then one of e wardens came along, and we watched omething red in the sky which broke to several pieces. We are supposed to eport flares, though this didn't look ke one. The warden reported it, and proved to be an airplane which was eing brought down. I don't really like eople to die, but when the Germans queal about our barbarity I do somemes wonder what they think other eople believe, especially as at the same me they tell their own people of terfic raids over London.

In the meantime we go to plays—many of them far away from the war, such as Restoration plays or Russian plays or some Shakespeare; we try to shop, but though the windows look full there is very little in the shops when it comes down to buying something; what you can do for a coupon is common conversation, far more than the huge prices of clothes for all but utility clothes, of which there are very good exemplars. Girls all go bare-headed and bare-legged—indeed, I was at an interdepartmental conference at one of the ministries the other day and two women pundits turned up with large mottled bare legs. Liquor is very difficult to get and costs a fortune. Rubber has disappeared, and we are wondering what to do about the various purposes for which elastic is necessary. But perhaps the most noticeable change is the disappearance into uniform of all the twenty-year-olds or thereabouts. There are the A. T. S. girls of the Army, the Waafs of the Air Force, and the Wrens of the Royal Navy. The latter look the smartest and are also perhaps most carefully picked. But they all look charming. Uniform has become an age mark, and everybody not in it is either very young, or getting on a bit.

We are painfully shabby and untidy, I am sorry to say. If you see somebody smart, she is generally American or Canadian. London seems full of these, and in buses you notice them everywhere, many of them of course in uniform, which is very becoming to them. If you could come straight to London from pre-war days, you would find it extraordinarily changed, even though the parks and to some extent the flowers, are at their loveliest—green mingled with blossom. Although this should have been a bad spring, there seems to be a wealth of flowers everywhere. The ducks are ornamental in the parks, too. I often wonder how they feed them. Keeping pets—even the harmless necessary cat—is very difficult, and some butchers have a private system by which cats become "registered customers," that is, if the holder of a ration book deals at a certain shop the butcher will keep dreadful-looking delicacies such as "lights" for them.

I want sometime to write to you what we are doing about planning, but I must stop now. M. H.

London, May 26

In Defense of Banks

Dear Sirs: Charles W. Sherman of Vallejo, California, whose letter was published in The Nation of May 29 under the title Old Hickory Was Right, will be surprised if he sees this answer to his letter. His first surprise will be at the fact that a banker reads The Nation religiously and finds it of great value in helping him in his effort to arrive at a fair and just analysis of the problems now confronting the world. Mr. Sherman's second surprise might be caused by a realization of how ignorant he is of how the banks operate, and why. This letter would not be written except for the fact that there are undoubtedly many men just as uninformed as Mr. Sherman is on this subject.

Mr. Sherman says that "too many bank officials have absconded with the people's money." I warrant that over the years there have been many more bank officials who have scraped the bottom of their own pockets in their effort to protect their depositors against the inevitable losses caused by breakdowns of the economic system.

In the case of very few bank failures have the depositors lost "all their deposits." Nearly always there was some salvage for the depositor, where there was none for the banker himself or his stockholders.

In the third paragraph of his letter Mr. Sherman calls attention to the fact that there were times when banks could afford to pay 3 per cent interest on savings accounts and there were no such things as service charges. He is quite right. In those times banks could obtain from 4 to 6 per cent on their self-liquidating loans to the largest corporations in the country, and even government bonds yielded 4¼ per cent. Now, that the demand for loans of all kinds has dried up, and the government bonds which the banks are expected to purchase pay ⅜ per cent or ⅞ per cent, the average rate received by most banks on the total of their deposits and capital is little over 1 per cent. Commercial banks still paying 1 per cent for savings are running that department at a loss.

Of course Mr. Sherman did not stop to think that there is such a thing as "overhead" in the banking business. Where does he think the bank gets the money to pay the rent, taxes, salaries, stationery, etc.? It costs on the average about 50 cents a month for a bank to carry a checking account. Each item deposited or withdrawn from a bank costs money to handle.

It is not true that the government deposits funds in each bank to meet its checks that are presented. These checks have to be collected from the government in the usual way and take the usual time. Many banks cashing government checks for non-customers without charge are merely lending money without interest, besides furnishing a very useful and convenient service to which the non-customer is not entitled. In addition the Treasury Department has warned the banks not to cash government checks for people they don't know, as the banks have to accept the liability for guaranteeing the indorsement to the government. This guaranty runs for many years.

Mr. Sherman does not know that it costs about $3 to put a loan on the bank's books. Does he expect to borrow $100 for thirty days at 6 per cent simple interest, for which he would pay 50 cents and the bank would lose $2.50?

Of course banks must operate at a profit or they are not safe places for the people to deposit their money. Mr. Sherman would certainly not like to carry his funds in a bank that he knew was losing money and impairing its surplus and capital, which are paid in by the stockholders or built up out of earnings for his protection. I am afraid that Mr. Sherman just did not think it through when he wrote his letter.

Strategy, Not Views

Dear Sirs: As my article Strategy for Negroes in the issue of June 26 was sent you in February, some of the contemporary allusions are now a little faded. Understandably you have changed my original comment on Soviet policy, since what I then suggested as probable has meanwhile come to pass.

But I regret the several other alterations you have made, apparently to spare Negro sensibilities. My own view and my experience is that the Negro deserves and relishes candor like any other man.

Apparently your solicitude springs from a total misconception of my theme. Your elaborate introductory disclaimer explains that you published my article to demonstrate the gap between your position and that of even the most advanced Southern liberals. Now I doubt whether I am qualified to represent Southern liberals, and as I was born in Pennsylvania, many of them would hardly accept me. That, however, is beside the point. In my article my views are never mentioned and, indeed, have nothing to do with the subject, for I was discussing not how I felt toward the Negro but how the Negro had best act toward the white man.

Naturally I have views on the Negro, but they are held by a minority North and South. Those who advise the Negro to act as if we were in the majority are therefore strategically unrealistic.

The Negro himself has in the past shown realism on this very point. He has given his allegiance, not to John Brown, but to one who denounced the old explosivist—Abraham Lincoln. Times change, but principles do not. I believe that in facing this problem, one of the most baffling in social history, our guide should still be the leader who balanced compassion with wisdom and sought, as we should now, only the utmost the generation can give.

Frontiers as Barriers

Dear Sirs: There is a real danger that the disputes which threaten to break out between various members of the United Nations over frontiers in Europe after the defeat of Hitler may fan the flames of isolationism among the American people and lead again to a withdrawal by the American government from cooperation in organizing the world for peace.

Under such circumstances, the duty of progressives is less to take sides regarding the location of boundaries, than to try to mobilize opinion in favor of reducing in every way possible the importance of frontiers as barriers to the flow of men, ideas, and goods moving in both directions.

Not where frontiers are but what they are is the most important question. As a matter of fact, this was the unanimous conclusion reached by a group of eminent Social Democratic refugees from the Axis nations and from those fighting them, and there is little doubt that what is left of the Labor and Socialist International would throw its full weight behind the program of reducing the importance of frontiers throughout the world.

There's a Difference

Dear Sirs: Although in my clearly u favorable review of Ilya Ehrenburg "The Fall of Paris" in your issue January I would have wished to gi the author at least his nominal due, see that the "h" was dropped from h name. It is unimportant—I have learne that the spelling has been subject to th variation in the past. But I very muc regret that a serious distortion in th political sense of the review was printe I represent Mr. Ehrenburg as sayin that the French workers "were sold o by the league between fascism and d mocracy," whereas what I wrote in m original was that according to "Th Fall of Paris" the French workers "we sold out by the league between fascis and the Social Democracy"—which quite a different matter. I shall be grat ful if you will call this printing err to the attention of your readers.

The Shape of Things

IN ITS HASTE TO ADJOURN, CONGRESS MADE amends for some of its worst blunders. Under pressure from the House, the Senate abandoned its rider on the war-agency appropriation bills that would have required appointments of government employees receiving $4,500 or more a year to be confirmed by the Senate. By the narrow margin of a single vote the Senate finally passed the House bill expanding the borrowing power of the Commodity Credit Corporation until December 31, with no restriction against the use of subsidies for rolling back prices. Earlier in the day the House Agricultural Committee tabled the Senate's ill-considered bill to raise the ceiling on corn from $1.07 to $1.40. Thus on three major issues American voters had reason to be grateful for the Constitutional provision that all legislation must pass two houses of Congress. The only major setback occurred on the last day when the Senate acceded to the House demand for abandonment of the wheat and cotton crop-insurance program. Earlier the House also had its way in forcing the abandonment of the National Youth Administration, but the Senate had rescued the Farm Security Administration and the Office of War Information from destruction at the hands of ill-tempered critics in the House. As a result of these last-minute actions the record of Congress—which will be reviewed in greater detail in next week's Washington letter—turned out to be less disastrous than seemed likely a few weeks ago. Nevertheless, history will probably record the acceptance of the adjournment resolution as the most constructive action taken by the Seventy-eighth Congress to date.

THANKS TO THE COURAGEOUS USE OF THE President's veto power, the Administration's anti-inflation program emerged from the hectic Congressional session substantially intact. It is even possible that the veto of the original Commodity Credit Corporation bill with its anti-subsidy provision may prove to have been the turning-point in the long retreat before a creeping inflation. A ban on subsidies would of course have destroyed all possibility of holding the present price line and thereby opened the door to a flood of demands for increased wages and higher profit margins. With subsidies it is possible to take the offensive and roll back prices. Moreover, although little has been said about it in the press, the use of subsidies provides by far the most effective weapon available against black markets. In the case of meat, for example, the bonuses paid by black-market operators are no greater, and probably less, than the amount of the proposed subsidy. Producers and packers will therefore have an incentive to keep their products in regular marketing channels, in order to qualify for the subsidy. This will have the triple effect of freezing out black-market racketeers, holding down prices, and making certain that supplies will be equally available to everyone under the rationing system.

WHEN MR. ROOSEVELT BLANDLY DISMISSED the question of recognizing the French Committee of Liberation by announcing that as far as he knows there is no France except for about 5 per cent which is outside Europe, he vastly improved the chances of French unity. If there is one subject on which De Gaulle and Giraud agree—one subject on which Giraud cannot afford to disagree with De Gaulle even to keep the favor of the Americans—it is the subject of French sovereignty. With an army and navy at its disposal and the larger part of a great empire to rule, the Committee of Liberation is obviously a de facto government. No matter how provisional its powers may be, they exist exactly as do the powers of the various governments in exile. And it expects the recognition of its allies—no matter how provisional that recognition may be. The President's remark was an ill-timed affront not only to De Gaulle but to Giraud as well and to all the forces, inside and outside France, which have joined the war on our side. It revealed the sense of superiority and power that has characterized our whole policy. It turned North Africa into an American colony, the French committee into something less than a puppet government. It marked the low point in American political strategy. Not even the canards and unfounded aspersions against De Gaulle which have flooded the press since Giraud's arrival in Washington will cause such deep and well-founded resentment as those few supercilious words from the President.

AN INVESTIGATION OF SPANISH FALANGE activities in the United States and Latin America was demanded last week by Representative Coffee. The demand was based on revelations contained in a book "Falange," by Allan Chase, which asserts, on apparently good authority, that the Falange has been under direct control of the Nazi General Wilhelm von Faupel since 1935 and that it carries on active fifth-column work in behalf of the Axis throughout the American republics, including the United States. The information that the Falange has served as a focus of Axis activities in Latin America is not news, but Mr. Chase also has chapters on Falangist work in the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and the United States. He reveals, for example, how the Falange members in the Philippines became, with few exceptions, active members of the civilian-defense organizations and used their position to spread rumors and otherwise prepare the way for Japanese occupation. The same pattern of penetration into defense agencies is said to have been followed in Puerto Rico, and while the number of active Falangists in the United States is believed to be small, at least some are alleged to be active in American civilian-defense agencies. We have no way of verifying all the sensational charges contained in Mr. Chase's book, but there is certainly enough evidence of a direct link between Berlin and the Falange in Latin America to justify an inquiry. Such an investigation might profitably inquire why the Dies committee has failed to take notice of this avowed pro-Axis organization while it has been saving America from the Lovetts, Dodds, and Watsons.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST DESERVES applause for having the fairness of mind to assess the evidence against Representative E. E. Cox of Georgia and the magnanimity to make amends to Federal Communications Commissioner Clifford J. Durr. The Post, which criticized Durr for asking Cox to disqualify himself as chairman of the committee investigating the FCC, has now reviewed the facts and decided—as The Nation did—that Durr is right. In an editorial printed last week the Post said that in view of the $2,500 Cox received from a radio station with a case before the FCC, "a truly sensitive man would have withdrawn from such a committee whether or not the facts mean what the commission says they mean." The Post also concluded that the House of Representatives had "forgotten its responsibilities when it permitted Representative Cox" to head the committee investigating the FCC. The House Judiciary Committee, in fact, seems to have forgotten completely to make any report whatever on Durr's formal petition for Cox's disqualification. The shameful situation still stands: a federal agency stumbled on evidence indicating that a Representative might have been guilty of a felony for taking money in a case before it. Instead of insisting on an inquiry by an impartial body to clear his name, this Representative, with the sanction of Congress, sets up an investigation to smear and harass the agency bringing the charges. This is not our idea of decent procedure in government.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY'S LEAP INTO THE arms of Mayor Hague makes both the comrades and the Jersey City boss look so foolish that we are tempted to applaud. But however clownish a performance, it has a serious political purpose and one which bodes no good for the liberal and labor forces in this country. Ever since its foundation, the American Labor Party in New York has been torn by Communist attempts to secure control, with the result that its effectiveness has been considerably reduced. Now an effort is being made to organize labor parties in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and other states. This does not suit the Communist Party, for the prospect that it will be able to win a foothold in such organizations is not promising. In New Jersey a labor party would gain its chief support from the strong C. I. O. unions, which are under excellent non-Communist leadership. That explains why the Communists have developed such surprising affection for Hague, who may privately be prepared to reciprocate since he too would find an American Labor Party in Jersey a threat to his power. The upshot is likely to be an attempt to hamstring independent political action by labor at a moment when the growing strength of reactionary forces makes it imperative that the voting power of the workers should be able to express itself. There are, however, compensating features in the Communist move, for one result may be to diminish still further the party's influence by enlightening some of its stooges. Already Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union, who usually follows the line, has dissented from its latest swerve, declaring: "You can't whitewash a bum like that [Hague] just because he says he supports the war."

STUDY OF AN EXCESS-INCOME TAX HAS BEEN ordered by the House Ways and Means Committee as a possible device for raising the bulk of the $16,000,000,000 which the President has requested for the current fiscal year. The principle behind the proposal is both simple and logical. Increases in income that are directly the result of the war or the war-created inflation make up a considerable proportion of the surplus income that is threatening to create a runaway inflation. The war profits of corporations are taxed; why not extend the same principle to individual incomes? On the surface, the arguments for an excess-income levy sound so persuasive that it comes as something of a shock to find the proposal receiving enthusiastic support from conservative groups that advocated the Ruml plan and have stoutly opposed further increases in the corporation or individual income taxes on the upper brackets. This support appears to have both a political and an economic basis. The excess-income levy is in the nature of a counterproposal to the Treasury's spendings tax, which has already been blacklisted as a New Deal plan. Furthermore, the excess-income tax is regarded as a possible weapon for checking the income-leveling process which has resulted from the war. From this point of view the supporters of the Ruml plan much prefer it to the spendings tax, which would uncover the real sources of excess income but leave untouched those in which incomes have merely been raised from subnormal to normal. Despite the nature of its support, a case can be made out for the excess-income levy provided that it be combined with a spendings levy and provided that adequate safeguards be included. Low-income families should, for example, be protected by an absolute exemption that is at least as large as the present income-tax exemption, and the levy should start modestly and be graduated in relation to a man's total income rather than merely his excess income. Obviously, a man whose income has increased from $10,000 to $11,000 a year should pay more than a man whose income has risen from $1,000 to $2,000.

WHEN MINERS GO ON STRIKE AGAINST THE high cost of living, the newspapers, as everybody knows, call it a strike. They ascribe it, in no uncertain terms, to selfishness, lack of patriotism, and, in effect, to criminal tendencies on the part of the workers. But when cattle raisers strike for higher prices by holding their stock off the market, the newspapers speak mysteriously of "conditions which are keeping cattle out of the ordinary courses of trade." Turner Catledge wrote a whole column of this kind of double talk in the New York Times of July 7. He spoke of "new devices whereby the price mechanism will be manipulated in an effort to break down the fence which is holding the cattle back"—they didn't include, so far as we know, a threat to call out the troops, though as result of the stock-owners' strike cattle receipts through regular commercial channels in Chicago in June of this year were 37 per cent under last year's figure. It was not until the next to the last paragraph that Mr. Catledge came right out and said that "the livestock producers are holding back for higher prices or selling for high prices in channels which flow into the black market." As we write, the strike is being broken—not by the government, backed by an outraged newspaper opinion—but by the fact that the grass on the ranges is drying up.

IT IS A PITY THAT IN THESE CROWDED WAR days so little attention can be paid to the final report of the La Follette committee covering its great investigation of "Employers' Associations and Collective Bargaining in California." "No one," Senator La Follette said in presenting the report to the Senate, "has ever discovered an association of workingmen formed for the express and avowed purpose of denying to their employers enjoyment of the right to organize and associate together for economic purposes." Yet in California and elsewhere employers have organized to crush this right of their employees. Senators La Follette and Thomas warned the Senate that in a period of comparative industrial peace we dare not forget that there may be a revival after the war of the same poisonous practices. They expect anti-union employers to take advantage of reaction and deflation after this war as they did after the last and organize to smash unionism. The Oppressive Labor-Practices Act recommended by the committee report would provide labor and democracy with powerful weapons against a move of that kind. If labor is wise it will plan a strong campaign now for the eventual passage of a measure which will be badly needed once the war is over.

THE TRAGIC DEATH OF GENERAL SIKORSKI makes the urgent task of restoring Russian-Polish relations incomparably more difficult, for the late Premier and Commander-in-Chief approached this problem in a far more realistic manner than most of his colleagues. Indeed, there is a grave danger that the Polish government-in-exile will now become completely dominated by those romantic reactionaries who have persuaded themselves that they can pursue a war against both Germany and Russia. The Polish President, Wlaydslaw Raczkiewicz, who was formerly associated with Colonel Beck and who opposed the Russo-Polish agreement negotiated by Sikorski in 1941, is politically well over on the right as is shown by his choice of General Sosnikowski to succeed Sikorski as commander-in-chief. This selection provoked a Cabinet crisis which was patched up when Sosnikowski undertook to confine himself to military matters. The task of negotiating with Russia, if and when the two governments can be brought together, will fall therefore upon the new Premier, Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, leader of the Peasant Party and a supporter of the Sikorski policy. Unfortunately the army, as the one remaining Polish institution which is intact—at least in miniature—exerts a powerful influence on political decisions, and its leadership by a man who broke with Sikorski because of his opposition to the original agreement with Russia is bound to be badly received in Moscow.

All Support for Wallace

EVERYONE who wants an all-out effort in the war must begin now, through progressive groups, patriotic organizations, and trade unions, to organize support for Vice-President Wallace in his fight with Jesse Jones. For while the Vice-President, by his outspoken and courageous attack upon Jones, succeeded in killing the McKellar amendment, that was only the first round in a new battle. The McKellar amendment would have given Jones an open legal veto over purchases of strategic materials by the Bureau of Economic Warfare. Jones's reply to Wallace indicates that he will continue to try to exert a veto by surreptitious means, despite the defeat of the amendment and despite the Presidential directive of April 13, 1942, shifting control over such imports from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Bureau. For Jones in that reply said that the duties and responsibilities of the RFC could not "be properly discharged by signing blank checks or executing without careful examination contracts that commit the government for hundreds of millions of dollars." This is tantamount to saying that Jones will not obey the Presidential directive. And it serves notice that Wallace may in the future expect the same kind of obstructionism from Jones and the RFC that has so badly hampered the BEW in the past.

To this challenge the Vice-President can make two replies. He can ask the President to remove Jones for disobedience. This the President may not feel himself strong enough to do, for Jones has great power in Congress. Or he can ask Congress to place at the disposal of the BEW the funds it needs for the purchase of war materials and thus make it completely independent of the RFC. This is what the Vice-President has decided to do. In his statement of June 30, after the White House conference with Jones and James F. Byrnes, Wallace said that the BEW would prepare legislation of this kind during the summer recess. "Mr. Jones," the Vice-President said, "did not object to this policy decision." Jones replied only, "Mr. Wallace was not authorized to speak for me."

If Jones has so much power in Congress that the President cannot fire him, how can Wallace hope to obtain independence from Jones at the hands of Congress? This question is not so formidable as it looks. Wallace and Milo Perkins, executive director of the BEW, have twice convinced key Congressional committees that it would be unwise for Congress to give Jones a veto over the stockpile program. A number of important Congressional committees, in one investigation or another, have seen for themselves how unsuited Jones is by temperament and outlook to wage total war. The Administration still has some power left in Congress, and there are enough fair-minded and thoughtful men in that body to be impressed by facts. With a measure of public support, the Vice-President should be able to obtain passage of the desired legislation. It would be disastrous for the war effort if the BEW were left at the mercy of Jones.

On the solid basis of the facts Wallace is still the winner in this dispute. Jones's reply to Wallace's charges made up in intemperance of statement what it lacked in concrete refutation. For when one has sifted the irrelevant and the trivial from the thirty-page document released by Jones, one finds virtually all Wallace's basic contentions admitted. And one sees that Jones's principal defense is that the OPM and its successor the WPB share responsibility for the failure of the stockpile program. This is hardly news.

Jones falls back on demagoguery: "Squandering the taxpayers' money even in war time is no proof of patriotism." This not only begs the question but has a comic aspect. The man who made our present contracts with the Aluminum Company of America, Standard Oil of New Jersey, and Bethlehem Steel for expansion in the fields of aluminum, synthetic rubber, and steel is in no position to accuse others of squandering public funds.

The clash between Wallace and Jones is a clash not merely of personalities but of opposed philosophies, and a victory for Jones would have serious consequences for the war effort and for post-war America. We ask all our readers to do what they can to build up the public understanding and support Wallace needs to win.

Rehearsal in Sicily

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE invasion of Sicily seems to have been accomplished with the same precision that marked the American landings in North Africa. Every report has emphasized the care with which advance arrangements had been made, the beautiful coordination of all forces, the impressive scale of the attack. Eisenhower has proved his skill in organizing and executing one of the most difficult of all military operations—a successful landing on a well-defended hostile shore.

How important the action will turn out to be no one can yet say. Some first-rate military experts believe that Hitler is prepared to sacrifice not only Sicily but all of Italy and to draw in the walls of his fortress around the heart of Europe. If this view is correct, it may be more essential for the Nazis to win a victory on the Kursk line than to shift troops to the south. But on the other hand the danger that the little second front in Sicily will develop into a real second front on the Continent may be sufficient to limit Hitler's offensive in the east.

But whether the attack on Sicily is looked upon as the direct prelude to an invasion of the Italian mainland or merely another step in the conquest of the Mediterranean island bases, it can at least be taken as a full-dress rehearsal for the final assault upon the Continent. For Sicily, unlike North Africa, is enemy territory. In North Africa a well-laid plot made possible an almost bloodless landing. In Sicily, according to the scanty reports from Allied headquarters and the more detailed if less reliable stories put out by the Axis, our troops face formidable defenses. In spite of superior air and sea power, the Allied forces landed under heavy fire and had to fight their way up the beaches. Several of Sicily's biggest airfields are still operating. Nor can we look for help from the population or from subverted officials. It is true that Sicily has always been an anti-Fascist stronghold; but even the most courageous and politically conscious elements will lie low as long as the island is guarded by three to five hundred thousand Italian and German troops. They will emerge only when military resistance begins to crumble. And even if Allied arms prevail, any potential fifth column will want to know the political intentions of the invaders before it goes into action.

We may be sure that every Italian anti-Fascist has drawn the obvious moral from the fate of the De Gaullists and other French patriots who helped the Americans in North Africa. Many of them were jailed by the men with whom we did business after the landings were accomplished; some are still locked up in Vichy prisons. And the elements we recognized and have worked with since then—from Darlan to Peyrouton and Noguès—are little different from the men against whom the Italian underground has conducted its twenty-year vendetta. Anti-Fascists in Sicily will need to be convinced that support of the Allied forces will not result in the perpetuation of reaction in Italy.

And if the underground is likely to be immobilized for political and military reasons, the ordinary people of Sicily will have the usual human reasons to resent invasion. They may be sick of war and disillusioned about Mussolini's dream of empire, but we cannot hope that they have reached the point where they prefer the horrors of invasion to continued Fascist rule.

In this sense, as well as in military terms, Sicily is a dress rehearsal for the Continent. It presents us with the difficult double job of conquest and collaboration: we must bring the enemy to his knees while at the same time we try to come to terms with those individuals and organized groups which form his active and potential opposition. To accomplish this, our commanders must develop more political sense than they have demonstrated in Africa. Unfortunately the course of events in Algiers and Washington and London offers little reason to believe that they have learned anything from their political blunders. It suggests instead that they will continue to deal with those elements in each "liberated" country which prove reliably subordinate to American authority. Men and women who have risked their lives for freedom and the defeat of fascism make poor puppets. They believe they have earned the right to govern their own countries. They will collaborate as allies; they will never serve as tools. These truths should be self-evident. They will prove as stubborn in Italy as in Algiers. And the hope of peace and a decent future depends upon the ability of those in authority to accept them while there is still time.

What the situation urgently demands is a simple, open declaration of intentions by President Roosevelt. He should promise the Italian people, in the name of the United Nations, that the Allied armies and governments after the liberation of Italy will have no dealings with Fascists but will carry out the occupation of the country in cooperation with known and trusted Italian democrats. Such a pledge would go a long way toward wiping out the evil effect of recent American policies. But we would have to mean it.

Mr. Nelson and Complacency

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 9

THERE is a serious letdown in production. Its principal cause is complacency and overconfidence. One of the main sources of that complacency and overconfidence is WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson. To support this charge, I beg the reader's indulgence while I go over some recent events and some significant, though little-noticed, figures. Statistics make dull reading, but these concern the welfare of our armed forces and our allies, may even affect the course of the war, and they deserve our patient attention.

On June 19 Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson told a press conference that production of supplies for the army ground forces in May was 3½ per-cent under April and 5½ per cent below schedule. WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson would make no comment for publication. But "off the record," in Washington fashion, a reply was made to the press. A WPB official said that the program of the army ground forces was only one-sixth of the total war program, that this was the area in which the largest "cut-backs" had been made, and that as a whole production in May "appeared to be" about 2 per cent above April.

The Under Secretary of War criticized both labor and management for "overconfidence and complacency." He tried to make them aware of what these production figures meant. He said that men in training would be denied needed equipment in order that shipments overseas might be maintained. "If the situation continues," the Under Secretary added, "even our overseas troops will suffer from shortages of critical equipment." The effect of the rejoinder from the WPB was to restore much of the complacency the Under Secretary may have shattered. The WPB seemed more interested in presenting an excuse than in helping to bring industry and the public to a sober and adult awareness of the greater efforts necessary if war supplies are to keep pace with strategy.

The statement issued by the WPB after the Patterson press conference was not merely poor psychology; it was also untruthful. That statement, made on June 19, estimated that over-all arms production in May was up 2 per cent. But on July 6, when Nelson issued his regular monthly report on production, it was disclosed that output in May, instead of showing a 2 per cent increase, was "virtually unchanged" from the April totals. Had the May totals been slightly above April, I think the report would have said so. My hunch is that "virtually unchanged" means slightly below April. It is true that the index number of munitions production in May is given as 563, the same as the figure for April. But the May figure is marked "preliminary," and that for April is the figure as finally revised. Preliminary figures, the ones given out to the press in these monthly reports, are usually revised downward; while the April figure is now recorded as 563, the preliminary figure originally given to the press on April production was 567. The day after the report was released, Nelson held a hurried press conference, of which Charles E. Egan, of the New York Times, wrote: "Nelson said that arms output was not discouraging, despite a 1 per cent decline in May as compared with April. . . ."

Whether "virtually unchanged" or down 1 per cent from April, production in May was obviously not keeping to schedule, for the schedule calls for a steady increase in production. The lag behind schedule is disclosed in the Nelson report of July 6. "Of the four major programs," this says, "merchant ships are farthest advanced, with 44 per cent of the year's objective estimated as completed by June 30. At the half-year mark, army ordnance and output of naval vessels and equipment were estimated at approximately 40 per cent of the 1943 goals, and the year's aircraft program will be 35 per cent completed." This indicates the need for a very sharp increase in the rate of production during the second half of this year if goals are to be achieved.

This lag in schedule is a very important matter at a time when the Nazis have launched a new offensive against the Soviet Union, and a second front is urgently needed, not merely to help the Russians, but to increase our own offensive striking power by coordinating it with action on the eastern front. General Brehon Somervell, in a warning against complacency in the July issue of Mill and Factory, says "a steady month-by-month increase in production" is necessary "to supply the bare minimum requirements of the army for the remainder of 1943, and to place us in position to deliver the striking power called for in our 1944 offensive plans." Somervell, the army supply chief, declares, "Obtaining the required rate of production increase for the rest of the year presents one of the major problems of the war for us." This quiet statement is a measure of the responsibility which rests on both management and workers in the factory.

The full measure of this responsibility cannot be brought home to the public if the WPB continues to handle production figures in its accustomed manner. On June 19 the public is given to understand that the Under Secretary of War is exaggerating. On July 6, in the monthly report on production, Nelson admits that the lag in production is serious and says, "We cannot afford to relax our efforts for an instant." On July 7 he holds a press conference in which he says that while there has been a decline in production, arms output is not discouraging. The main impression created by Nelson at the July 7 press conference was that the failure to show an increase in May was due principally to "cut-backs" in the army program, notably in tanks, and to changes in design in aircraft. The very next day Nelson goes to Toronto and makes another of those vapid bragging speeches: "American Production to Top Axis 2 to 1 in 1943, Nelson Says." Nelson boasted that we are turning out enough small-arms ammunition to fire 1,500 bullets at every soldier in the Axis armies. Dishing out statistical tripe of this kind is no way to awaken workers and management to a sober consciousness of their responsibilities.

Nelson is relying for his main excuse on "cut-backs," especially in the tank program, on which he dwelt in some detail at the July 7 press conference. Undoubtedly these "cut-backs," along with the changes in plane design to which Vice-Chairman C. E. Wilson referred, played their part in reducing the May totals. But the "cut-backs" in the tank program began last winter. In spite of this fact, output in April had shown a 7 per cent improvement over March, and not merely an over-all increase but an increase in all categories of munitions. Cut-backs in tanks cannot explain the 4 per cent decline in merchant vessels in May or the 3 per cent decline in ground ordnance and signal equipment. I do not blame Nelson for these declines, but I do blame him for not admitting them in manly fashion and focusing attention on them in order to wake people to the need for greater effort. I believe that he himself must bear a large share of the responsibility for the complacency and overconfidence which have most to do with the letdown.

An example of Nelson's methods is seen in his June 12 report to the President on the progress of war production in 1942. "The record," Nelson wrote the President, "certainly makes it clear that the American industrial system can be justifiably proud of an astonishing display of economic muscle." A giant industrial system like ours naturally can show big economic muscles. But the record does not indicate that these muscles have been flexed to their fullest extent. For if one reads the report carefully one finds, first, that the original Victory program for 1942 was reduced from $68,000,000,000 to $51,000,000,000 and, second, that actual production was only $40,500,000,000 or 20 per cent short of the reduced goal. Nelson's excuse is that "the objectives were too high." "Had the schedules been prepared realistically," he says, "it would have been obvious early in 1942 that the objectives were out of line with resources. . . ." But how can this be reconciled with the report's admission that in 1942, despite Pearl Harbor, "the volume of commodities and services going to consumers . . . remained almost exactly at 1941 levels"—the highest in history, 8.5 per cent over 1940 and 15 per cent greater than 1939. Can it be said that the program exceeded the "limits of feasibility" when civilian consumption of materials and man-power continued at boom levels?

[For reasons which this article itself makes clear, its author has deemed it necessary to guard his anonymity with especial care. His identity has been revealed only to our Washington editor, I. F. Stone, who as a friend of long standing is able to vouch for his absolute reliability. The personal experience of the editors of The Nation, together with checks they have made with other government officials, fully bear out his charges. A second and final instalment will appear next week.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

I AM a minor government executive. My job is helping to run one branch of a war agency in which several thousand persons are employed. We cheerfully work long hours, swelter in the country's worst climate, live jammed together like sardines—all this because we know that our work is vital to the war. We read the bulletins from our war fronts with a thrill of pride because we know that, though we are civilians, the army and navy rely heavily on us.

We have done a great deal to help smash the Axis—far more than we can boast about in public. And we could do a great deal more if we were not daily growing more exhausted, bitter, demoralized, and even terrorized by the unceasing warfare carried on against us. The situation has been bad for a long time. It has now become intolerable. The fascists we are helping to destroy in Europe and Asia might well wish to destroy us, but this campaign is waged right here in Washington by persons working for the government, paid out of public funds. I do not refer to Dies and Kerr and Cox and Smith—their demagoguery, though annoying enough, is worse than their bite. Far more effectively the Civil Service Commission and the FBI, by their attitude toward government workers, are undermining Washington's strength and will to fight. Hitler could do no more.

The weapon that is causing all the mischief is the so-called "character investigation" to which all workers in war agencies are subjected. It is made once, twice, sometimes over and over again. As an investigation it is a travesty. It is little if at all concerned with a man's character, loyalty, or sympathy for democratic ideals and forms of government. Sometimes one or two perfunctory questions are asked concerning possible sympathy for our enemies; sometimes none at all.

A man I know has kept score on the last hundred investigators who have come to his office, consuming with their inanities, vicious or otherwise, some forty-eight hours of time that he could ill spare from his war job. He tells me that only seven of the investigators showed more than a casual interest in uncovering the facts that you or I would want to know about a man's suitability for responsible war work. (One of the seven wanted to know if the man in question was a "Nasi or a Fasi"—he made the two words rhyme and, when asked, said he wasn't sure what a "Fasi" was.)

Before this comic and tragic investigation begins, a war worker has had to survive the thorough scrutiny of the agency which hires him. We are fussy about that and properly so. Job candidates usually have to be known to some one of us, and even then they have to run a gauntlet of many searching interviews, careful checking of references, and close questioning of friends and former employers. Then, often six months or a year after a man is hired, the FBI or the Civil Service sleuths swing into action.

Every day, and sometimes four or five times a day—because I am personally responsible for the work of three or four hundred of my associates—an investigator approaches my desk, flashes his credentials, opens a notebook, and begins a routine that is both blood-chilling and exasperating. It is a sad display of confusion, bigotry, and lack of understanding of the war we are fighting. We are engaged in a struggle to the death with the fascists. Grand juries have returned indictments for sedition and treason against many of their henchmen in this country. Yet this city alone has several thousand government investigators ransacking the town for anti-fascists and using as their textbooks and tipsheets the propaganda publications of the very men and women now awaiting trial on the most serious of charges.

The investigators who come to sit by my desk solemnly ask me such questions as the following. These are actual questions, written down as accurately as I can recall them, put to me and to people I know by Civil Service and FBI investigators.

> Has Jones ever agitated for labor unions?
> Does he favor the good or the bad unions?
> Does he support cooperatives?
> Does he mix with Negroes?
> Does he seem to have too many Jewish friends?
> Does his face light up when the Red Army is mentioned?
> Does he support a second front?
> How often does he read PM?
> Does he own pro-labor or radicalistic books?
> Has he ever criticized the Dies committee?
> Is he one-sided or advanced in his conversation?

Is he always criticizing Vichy France?

Does he buy out-of-town newspapers?

Does he stay up late every night?

Does he turn first to Russian news in the paper?

Does he think the colored races are as good as the white?

Is he faithful to his wife?

Why do you suppose he has hired so many Jews?

Is it true that he reads The Nation and the New Republic?

Has he ever solicited for the Russian War Relief?

Did he ever say any other form of government is as good as ours?

Does he praise the movie "Mission to Moscow"?

Would you say he went far enough in condemning the Russian system?

Does he talk a lot against the poll tax?

Do you think he is excessive in opposing fascism or Nazism?

Did you ever hear him whistle or sing the communistic "Internationale" or other subversive songs?

Does he support the Newspaper Guild?

Questions like these are being used as a sieve to strain anti-fascists and liberals out of the government. They serve no other purpose. You don't look for enemy agents or sympathizers among people who read PM, The Nation, the New Republic; among people who believe in the dignity and equality of all men; among people who condemn the poll tax, Vichy France, Dies, Jim Crow; among people who admire unions, cooperatives, and the heroic exploits of the Red Army.

If investigators can manage to place Jones, the government worker, in any of those categories, the next step is a curt letter from the Civil Service Commission requesting his employers to fire him because his "suitability has not been established." This curious, weasel-worded phrase is the only indictment furnished against Jones; it usually means that he loves liberalism or hates fascism. The almost certain result is that the millions and millions of Americans who share his views and desperately need their expression in Washington will be deprived henceforth of his services.

What sort of people do the investigators single out as victims? Ordinary, decent people like ourselves. Let me tell you about three or four typical cases. Professor A, whose honors, distinguished career, and scholarly publications would fill a quarter-page in "Who's Who," was found "unsuitable" after six months or more of investigation by both Civil Service and the FBI. No one questioned his qualifications. No one suspected him of sympathy for our enemies; he had been denouncing them for a decade. But that was his undoing. He was under the usual suspicion of being a Communist or of sympathizing with Communists apparently because a cranky neighbor had said that he had loud, boorish people, "obviously Communists," at his house and because a labor-baiter with a criminal record and drunken habits spun a fantastic tale of malice. The FBI and the Civil Service Commission gave Professor A no opportunity to confront his accusers and disprove their slander. Instead, they brought forth more nonsense. Professor A had given as reference another professor, even more distinguished, whose name is well and honorably known to most educated people. The FBI looked up this man in one of their favorite authorities and reported that he was said to be radical and communistic. Their source-book was "The Red Network," by Elizabeth Dilling, who was at the moment under federal indictment on charges of sedition!

Take the case of Miss B, who was accused of having had "mixed parties" at her apartment and dismissed from her job. "Mixed" was defined, under pressure, as meaning "Negroes and whites"; later this was cautiously modified to "boys and girls." Miss B was an able, competent worker. It would be hard to say which of the definitions furnished as a basis for her dismissal was the more frivolous.

Mr. C, a scientist with hard-to-replace skills, was also found "unsuitable." He would have been perfectly suitable, it appears, if he had not been quite so active in connection with a committee organized to sponsor a concert by Marian Anderson after she had been jim-crowed by the D. A. R. (His fellow-sponsors included half a dozen Cabinet members, more than two score members of Congress, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, William Green, the Washington Chamber of Commerce, and an American Legion post.)

Mr. D, a writer, incurred the wrath of the Civil Service because six years ago his agent donated an unsalable article to Fight, a magazine published by the American League Against War and Fascism. In this article D said that if the fascists of Germany and Japan were not discouraged by common action of the democracies they would some day attack us. While this prophet without honor in the government was under fire, the Civil Service Commission and the FBI made no objection to the employment in a confidential post of a person who had been secretary to both the German and Finnish embassies, or of a person later arrested as an undercover propagandist for the Japanese.

Too much reading of the works of Mrs. Dilling has given the investigators a "network" psychosis. They seem happiest when they can catch a number of people in the same flimsy spider's web. Then they have uncovered a great conspiracy and can bring about a mass purge of government workers. Investigating Jones, they discover that he knows Smith; Smith is a cousin of Brown; Brown in an unlucky moment once signed a petition calling for diplomatic recognition of the Soviet Union, thus getting himself immortalized in the FBI's files. Smith, Brown, and Jones, all attend a party at which stranger Zilch, who has had six martinis, says that the Red Army, by saving Stalingrad, saved mankind. Jones, Brown, Smith, and Zilch are then linked together as subversives.

Or take an actual case. An FBI agent somehow managed to copy a list of telephone numbers hanging by a government employee's telephone. The list included the plumber, the grocer, the laundry, the corner movie house—and the name of a man in the same office who, when cross-checked in FBI files, turned out to be on one of Dies's lists. A dentist was also included. A man with a name similar to his had given money to a civil-rights organization. A social acquaintance whose number was given had a brother who was on the mailing list of a cooperative organization in ill repute with the inquisitors. This was all that was needed to piece together a whole Washington "red network"; the list of telephone numbers became a "contact list" and was actually offered as ground for firing the employee in question.

By just such a trick Stuart Chase once proved that Martin Dies was a Communist; one could similarly prove that the King of England is a Nazi, or that you beat your wife. Absurd as it is, this is one of the devices of intimidation here in Washington. Through its use the most innocent of actions can be given a sinister tinge. For example, when a rabid Southern Congressman described the New York Times as a "Jewish Communist newspaper," an FBI man, within a week, asked me whether my acquaintance habitually read the Times.

In any proper procedure of hearings the investigators' stupid prejudices and absurd evidence would be ruled out—just as a policeman's notion that a man is a murderer because he wears a striped suit vanishes in the fair trial that is guaranteed to any suspect brought into court. But the hearing afforded government workers by the Civil Service and the FBI is devoid of any color of fairness or justice. The investigators are prosecution, judge, and jury rolled into one. The accused is denied counsel, witnesses, and even a statement of the charges against him. He is not allowed to face his accusers. In secluded rooms, for all the world like Gestapo headquarters in Berlin, he is bullied and intimidated and peppered with questions designed to trap him. The rankest hearsay passes for crushing evidence.

The penalty for an investigatory finding of guilt is peremptory dismissal from the government. This means being blacklisted for life, a denial to a citizen of his right to serve his country in time of war, the inference—soon known to the whole community—that he is somehow a traitor, a seditionist, a disloyal fellow to be shunned by decent men.

No government employee is safe from such an obscene attack on the elemental decencies. President Roosevelt himself could not qualify for work in a war agency. Did he not entertain the Soviet Premier, Molotov, in the White House? Busy as he is with questions of global war, he perhaps does not mark the steady weeding out from his agencies of those who could be counted on to push rather than sabotage his war program. But if the public allows the last liberal, the last anti-fascist, the last friend of the workingman and the consumer to be stoned out of Washington, or submerged until submissive in a Potomac ducking-stool, the results will be grave indeed.

Let's Look at Labor

III. DEATH IN THE FACTORIES

BY ALICE HAMILTON

THE National Safety Council's preliminary report on accidents in 1942 presents a startling picture of what the intensity of war production means in the life of the workers. Accidents, fatal or crippling, have mounted and are still mounting. Here are a few figures. While the death rate for automobile accidents fell 30 per cent in 1942 as compared with 1941, that for manufacturing establishments rose 14 per cent. In seven states the rise was more than 25 per cent. Some 18,500 workers were killed on the job, and 1,750,000 were injured, 70,000 of them permanently. Among railroad employees there were 26 per cent more deaths than in 1941, 37 per cent more accidents. Two mine explosions took the lives of fifty-six and thirty-four miners; an explosion in an ordnance plant killed fifty-four. Using our customary method of presenting disaster in terms of dollars and cents, the report informs us that the money loss of 1942 accidents—wages, medical expenses, overhead costs of insurance—is estimated at $900,000,000.

What are the causes of this appalling loss of life or of what makes life worth living—health and the ability to work? First must be cited the great increase in the number of persons employed; an influx of new, inexperienced workers inevitably increases the rate of job accidents. Also hours are longer; there are night shifts; many workers have the added fatigue of a long drive to and from work. A good hot meal does more to banish fatigue than any other measure, but even according to the optimistic statement of Dr. Victor Heiser, only some 51 per cent of the plants engaged in war production provide this for their employees. Then there is the difficulty of getting proper safety devices installed in new plants, although it is sometimes startling to see how quickly this can be done after a serious accident has made the need evident. We do not yet know what change will follow the increased employment of women, but we must not forget that women in industry are massed in the early age groups, as men are not. The majority are under thirty, many under twenty. A minority are mothers of families with many duties outside their jobs. Though women are less reckless than men, they are less experienced, more easily tired, more liable to illness, more given to day-dreaming.

On occupational sickness, which is less spectacular than accidents but in certain industries more common, we have no data from the National Safety Council as yet, and it will be some time before any can be presented. This is easy to understand. Accidents are evident to everyone; disease comes on insidiously, and often the worker does not know that the cause is connected with his work. His physician may be quite as much in the dark, and thus many cases of occupational disease go unrecognized and unreported. We hear a great deal about false claims for compensation made by malingerers, but my experience, over many years, has led me to believe that the number of workmen who conceal illness for fear of losing their job is greater than the number of those who fake illness to collect damages. There is every reason to believe that the rate of industrial disease is going up.

Inevitably it is being accelerated by the conditions of war production. Exposure to familiar harmful substances is increased, and new processes are unloosing new fumes and gases. The dangers of silica, lead, mercury, and brass are well known. Silica is one of the most widespread of the industrial hazards and one of the hardest to control. Wherever sand or silicious rock dust is present in the air, we must expect to find silicosis. And as industry is increasingly mechanized, the danger grows. Silicosis increased steadily among granite cutters after the air hammer was introduced; among anthracite-coal and metal miners after the jackhammer came in. Every increase in the demand for copper, lead, and zinc means more men exposed to silica dust. Manganese, a poison to the brain and nerves, is needed in ever greater quantities for steel; chromium, cadmium, fluorides, all are endangering larger and larger groups of workmen.

Red lead, which had practically disappeared from ship painting, is now being used again on a large scale. Enormous quantities of nitric acid go into explosives—TNT, nitroglycerine, guncotton. It is also used in the reopened mercury mines and mills to make the mercury fulminate which is the booster charge in bombs and shells. In the great class of solvents, some are highly toxic, others only slightly so. Industry had rid itself very efficiently of the more dangerous ones, but now they are back again because war production monopolizes the safer ones. The manufacturer of coatings cannot use toluol any more because it is needed to make TNT; so he turns to poisonous benzol.

New chemicals have come into use to meet war needs —to produce synthetic rubber and for new explosives. The federal Public Health Service takes up these compounds at once and tests them on animals, publishing the results as promptly as possible, but such studies tell us nothing of the slow action of a poison which the workman breathes in doses too small to produce any acute symptoms. To discover this, large groups of workmen must be carefully watched for long periods.

What should be the attitude of organized labor toward the war-time problems of accidents and disease? I think that its first duty is to take the matter seriously, and this will be a new departure. Workingmen are like all men: as long as they are strong and well they are not interested in the prevention of sickness or very much concerned about the prevention of accidents. It is a part of our national recklessness, our willingness to take risks and impatience of control, a recklessness clearly demonstrated in the automobile-accident rate when gasoline was abundant. Only the sick or crippled in any walk of life take health protection as a really important question. In my experience trade-union officials, with a few brilliant exceptions, devote their efforts not to the prevention of accidents and disease but to the securing of compensation for the victim. Money, however, can never really compensate for death, or even for serious illness. A man with lead palsy, even if he has a pension, is still a cripple. The widow of a zinc miner may have a monthly income but is still a widow. The fact that the victims face the possible disaster with fatalistic indifference and fight much harder for a wage increase than for safe conditions of work does not remove responsibility from their unions. It is for the union to be wiser and more far-seeing than the individual.

Most unions—for example, the building-trades unions and the miners—have been more alert to prevent accidents than disease, and this is natural. Accidents are dramatic and their causes are clear. Industrial disease sometimes comes on like an accident, as when a man is gassed by carbon monoxide or a girl faints on a hot day over a kettle of solvent, but usually it is gradual in its course, with nothing startling about it. Now that inexperienced men and women are coming into industry, far more vigilance is needed if they are to be protected against the dangers which the old hand has learned to recognize and avoid. In some manufacturing plants the instruction and care of green hands is admirably handled, but in others the old rule still prevails: say nothing about the risks or you will start the employees fancying themselves sick and making foolish claims. This is where the union should step in and give the needed instruction. The federal Department of Labor supplies leaflets which describe in simple words the uses of each of the known dangerous dusts and gases, the symptoms they give rise to, and the way the worker may protect himself.

Often the workers are familiar with the danger, and then what is needed is continual preaching of safety maxims, seeing to it that the accepted safeguards are provided by the employer and used by the worker. In the case of the newer hazards, union officials can render invaluable service. Members should be encouraged to report any suspicious illness that seems to be connected with a new process. For instance, a new solvent may be introduced, and presently many of the workers may complain of illness. It is for the union to insist on an investigation by experts. Such watchfulness has led to the discovery of many a dangerous industrial gas or dust about which even physicians previously knew little or nothing.

Sometimes the investigation can be made by the medical staff of the plant. In some states the Labor Department is equipped to do it; in others the state Department of Health will consent to undertake it. When all else fails, there can be an appeal to the federal Department of Labor. The ideal system is in operation in New York State, where the Department of Labor has its own staff of expert physicians working in close collaboration with the factory inspectors. Before the war Senator Murray of Montana introduced a bill which would have made it possible for all state labor departments to be so equipped, but the measure is probably shelved till the war is ended, although it is more needed now than ever. In a few states there is good cooperation between the health and labor departments, and labor can get a hearing and intelligent help.

It is gratifying to hear that the United Automobile Workers in Detroit are reopening their own medical department. They made a fine beginning with this in the early days of the union but closed it some years ago. Such a department is in strong contrast to the system that still obtains in the coal mines, where the physician is appointed by the company and responsible to the company but is paid entirely by money deducted from the monthly pay check of the miners. The men have nothing to say about the choice of a doctor, and even if they dislike and mistrust the company's choice they are forced to support him. It is amazing that a strong union like that of the coal miners has submitted all these years to such a system.

THE POLITICAL thought-reading department of Business Week announces that President Roosevelt doesn't really want to stop inflation: "To cinch the white-collar consumer vote, the President is counting on a campaign built around the high cost of living. That campaign calls for a vigorous price-control policy—even though an ineffective one—to establish him as the consumers' friend. Proponents say that Congress will get the blame . . . when prices go right on up despite brave words from the White House."

THE BULLETIN of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States calls for larger allocations of steel for farm machinery, and hints that the large companies could use it to better advantage than the small ones. "They have better facilities for using a variety of types of steel . . . and, in some cases, they can switch workers from munitions production."

TWO PROMINENT Massachusetts doctors who gave public support to a birth-control referendum in the last state election have been notified by St. Luke's Hospital in Pittsfield that they will not be permitted to practice in that hospital.

A NATION CONTRIBUTOR reports this dining-car conversation with a man just returned from Bolivia: "What's the labor situation in the mines?" "Okay now, since they picked out four or five bolsheviks and shot them." "Is that a fact? Well, what are wages?" "Seventy-five cents a day." "Can a man live on that?" "No."

THE WAR has changed our reading habits. Althea Warren, president of the American Library Association, says reading today is "of two extremes of density—thistledown entertainment . . . or research of the most . . . exacting type. . . . People who used to consume three or four volumes a week now spend a month on books like the Beveridge Report or Mackinder's 'Democratic Ideals and Reality.' "

ENGLISH ACTORS are now allowed special licenses to buy double-breasted suits, according to the London Evening News, "because it is considered 'not quite nice' for music-hall performers to show their braces [suspenders] or too wide an expanse of shirt on the stage."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Czech fascist organization, Vlajka (Flag), has been dissolved by the Nazis. It was too small to be worth while. . . . There has lately been an epidemic of fires in Belgian theaters requisitioned "for Germans only." . . . To a Bible study group in Bergen, Norway, the Nazi Bishop Falch Hansen announced that he had found references to Vidkun Quisling in the Book of Revelation.

Food Relief: a Neglected Report

BY ALLAN SPALDING

EVEN if other more controversial issues have been shoved aside, one might at least expect that on the issue of food relief the United Nations would by this time have devised a clear-cut policy. It is certainly not a problem which can be shirked until the last minute. After the war is won and the armistice is declared, there will be millions of people in devastated areas all over the earth who, because the systems of agriculture and transportation have been disrupted, will either succumb to starvation or present an insuperable obstacle to any attempt to organize the peace. In this dismal dilemma more than one political strategist may discover the hope that by offering the masses food he can abolish the danger of riot and rebellion. Such a supposition is naive. The transition from war to peace cannot be dealt with in terms as simple as that. But with an efficient relief machinery the United Nations can at least facilitate the job of reconstruction and at the same time prove that "freedom from want" is not just another empty slogan.

Up to now, no such machinery has been established. Worse still, the public has been deliberately kept unaware both of the vital necessity for coordinated planning and of the failure to secure it. Official activities with regard to food relief have been cloaked in mystery. The usual excuse for censorship is that relief feeding will require huge amounts of food and therefore be unpopular with the American people, who are getting tired of the hardships they've already been forced to undergo. Any relief program will have to be devised with great secrecy so that it can spring into full-fledged operation, unhampered by popular dissent in its initial stages.

This slipshod, undignified excuse doesn't argue well for the fiber of the American people. It is even held in contempt by most of those who are forced to advance it. Many officials in charge of the relief problem feel that people should know how the matter is being handled.

Jealous supervision is exercised by the State Department over the whole field of food relief. Not only is the Lehman committee housed in the State Department, but its staff receive their salaries direct from the department. Relief activities of other government agencies must receive the nod of the State Department. The domination of the department has made impossible even such practical steps as the creation of a central relief stockpile. No policies have been formulated which could be put into effect if war ended tomorrow.

An excellent nucleus for planning was created last October when an Interdepartmental Committee on Food Relief was authorized by—paradoxically enough—the State Department. The committee worked rapidly, and submitted its first progress report to Governor Lehman on December 15. Apparently it worked too rapidly, and too efficiently, for its own good. Its report was seen by very few officials and all mention of it was hushed. Its recommendations ignored, the Interdepartmental Committee died an ignominious death.

But the fact that a problem does exist, and that it is serious, was amply proved in the Interdepartmental Committee's report. The committee confined itself to working out the first year's relief needs for the "outer fringe" of continental Europe, comprising Norway, Belgium, the Netherlands, France, Greece, Italy, Albania, and the coast of Yugoslavia. The period of one crop year was selected as a yardstick by which to gauge requirements over a longer period of time. Members of the committee concentrated their attention on these questions:

1. About how many people in the territory considered will need some form of food relief?

2. To what extent has production in each occupied country been knocked out by the war?

3. What are the exact nutritional deficiencies, and what are the minimum rations required to supply them?

4. How large will be the food reserves of other United Nations?

5. What are some of the specific difficulties involved in establishing a relief reserve?

Here are some of the committee's conclusions—never before made public:

1. Out of a total population of about 115,000,000 in the eight countries studied, about 23,000,000 people will need either emergency or supplementary food relief. This will necessitate shipment of at least 5,800,000 tons of food during the first year. In specific proportions, the supplies will probably be composed of 13 per cent legumes, 9 per cent vegetables and fruits, 7 per cent potatoes, 7 per cent meat and fish, 4 per cent fats and oils, 4 per cent milk and milk products, 2 per cent sugar and molasses, and 1 per cent eggs, in addition to the basic cereals.

2. Domestic production in Greece, Belgium, and Norway will not be able to achieve more than two-fifths of its normal volume; in France and the Netherlands only slightly more than half. Italy's farms will produce about 80 per cent of their pre-war average.

EUROPE EXISTS

In spite of the fact that France was last week officially declared non-existent and that the same theory may be extended any day to the other occupied countries, news from England indicates that some prominent Europeans cling to the illusion that the Continent is still there. An Alliance of Parliamentarians of Occupied Countries, including France, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Norway, Holland, and Luxembourg, was recently called together in London, under the chairmanship of the president of the Belgian Senate. Among the resolutions adopted was one affirming that the war was being fought "not alone for the restoration of national independence and the territorial integrity of the various countries but also to bring about the revival in the liberated countries of civil rights and a system of government conforming to democratic principles."

3. Dietary diseases are already widespread in the occupied countries, and relief demands will be almost entirely for protective foods. Since requirements for these will vary among different sections of the population in each country, four kinds of rations have been suggested—emergency, maintenance, supplementary, and special rations. These rations would call for a considerable expansion of our present processing facilities.

4. Stocks of food normally exported—such as wheat, cereals, sugar, coffee, etc.—have been piling up in some countries, and these might be contributed to a central United Nations reserve. An international food-relief program is necessary to determine potential food supplies in these regions and to arrange to pool all reserves.

So far, the closest approximation to international cooperation on the food problem, following the international wheat agreement, is to be found in an agreement we signed with England establishing a liaison between the Interdepartmental Committee and the Inter-Allied Committee in London. The Inter-Allied Committee, created in 1939, has confined itself almost entirely to research on the nutritive requirements of occupied territories. Since the Interdepartmental Committee has stopped functioning, this agreement has no validity.

5. Many technical problems will be encountered in setting up a central stockpile, such as the locating of warehouses near shipping points, the turnover of stocks to prevent spoilage, etc. Such a stockpile would have to be kept extremely flexible so that it could be used not only for all countries but for contingencies other than relief, including losses of supply areas, shipping losses, and variations in production.

In its report the committee stresses the fact that these conclusions are merely tentative. In addition to the broader policies still to be worked out, there are countless details, such as an inventory of all storage and processing facilities in the United Nations, determination of relief shipping requirements and allocation of tonnage, and training of administrative personnel.

The promised relief conference this summer faces a gigantic task. It will be helped by sporadic work already under way, much of it extremely valuable. The Board of Economic Warfare, for example, in addition to drawing up plans for the creation of relief stockpiles in Tunisia, has done excellent work in determining foreign supplies and requirements. The Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations has established committees to study the agricultural situation in each country. Lend-lease has its own general-purpose stockpiles which might be drawn upon for relief needs if necessary. But all the work being done barely scratches the surface. We need a centralized, coordinated policy on foreign food relief. The formulation of that policy is the job which the relief conference must shoulder, or else fail in its responsibility to the peoples of the world.

BY ARGUS

WHENEVER people try to picture conditions in post-war Europe the idea is put forth that political and criminal gangs will play an important role. Confirmation for this view is found in the Essener Nationalzeitung of June 18 in an item reporting the arrest of thirty members of a robber band which had established itself in Duisburg, or rather the ruins of Duisburg. Their leader was a certain Willi Springfeld who—and this is also interesting—had deserted from the army in October and been sought in vain ever since. One of the members was the owner of a city-wide freight business, and his trucks were valuable equipment for the gang's activities. Everything that is scarce in these times of war was stolen out of bombed houses and sold. Used clothing was in especial demand; 110 trunkfuls were said to have been found in cellars occupied by the gang. The members also made forays into the country and stole calves and pigs, which were then slaughtered and sold on the black market. Is it the pattern for the shape of things to come?

Alsace-Lorraine is a "redeemed" province. Of all the countries which had been subjected to the blessings of the New Order, it presented the most favorable conditions for successful Nazification. A considerable number of the inhabitants were not enthusiastic about the French. The whole French-speaking population had been moved out, and the people "of German descent," the only ones who remained, were handled with kid gloves.

The result has been disappointing, and the press is beginning to speak out about it. The Mühlhauser Tageblatt of June 6 complained of the "opportunists who during the two years in which National Socialism went from success to success joined us vociferously, only to falter as soon as a single defeat followed on the victories." On June 20 the same newspaper became several shades more explicit, indeed almost tragic: "We party members have no more illusions about the difficulties facing us in Alsace—difficulties which sometimes seem beyond our strength. During the Battle of Stalingrad, for instance, life was frankly hard for party members. But the Führer, in his struggle for Europe, needs men who keep their word for better or for worse. In Alsace we must do our duty in silence, endure all insults."

"Can anyone seriously believe," asked the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung on July 13, "that the National Socialist state will allow persons who hoard things of intrinsic value to fare better in the end than those who put their savings in government bonds?"

For months the campaign against persons buying up articles of "real worth" has been carried on in the newspapers with varying intensity—and of course with no effect. Germans have had experience of inflation. They learned in 1923 what it means. They learned that the value of money melts away but not the value of substantial things—goods of any kind, houses, land, factories. And since they are firmly convinced that the mark will collapse again, they have embarked on a "buying spree." All classes are trying to turn every spare mark into something of real value, no matter what.

Not much is to be had now. Most things are rationed. The shops are empty, and anyone who owns anything wants to keep it for himself. But for that very reason the demand has become fiercer and less discriminating. "Everything obtainable," cried the Völkische Beobachter on June 12, "is being bought blindly. Why, for heaven's sake, this buying of millions of useless pieces of pottery? This orgy of spending and buying must stop." In the higher brackets it is not such things as pottery that those who would lay up wealth for themselves are buying. Other articles of intrinsic worth have been discovered, for example, objects of art. Pictures which promise to keep their value in some measure are bringing two and three times their price on the world market. A Berlin dispatch of April 5 to the Stockholm Sydsvenska Dagbladet Snaelposten said: "In these days, when works of art are considered a particularly good investment, forgeries flourish as never before. Countless false Spitzwegs, Böcklins, Manets, Monets, Renoirs, Van Goghs, and so forth are offered for sale. The Reich criminal police has had to set up a special bureau to deal with art forgeries."

On June 22 Minister of Economics Funk announced that he intended to use more than warnings to combat the craze for objects of real worth. "I do not doubt," he said, "that the sound feelings of the people will approve of stiff taxation measures against those who are acquiring such property." But apparently he misunderstood the feelings of the people. There seem to be few who are not hoarding—pottery or Manets.

Congratulations!

FOR centuries British diplomats have been famous as writers of memoirs. Even in the midst of this war the public was presented with that invaluable book "Failure of a Mission," in which Sir Nevile Henderson with engaging candor explained how an ambassador, in a grave hour, can make a fool of himself. But he died too early to write the full inside story of appeasement, and somebody must finish the task. If the story must be written in terms not of success but of failure, according to the pattern laid down by Sir Nevile, no man appears to be better qualified to do it than Sir Samuel Hoare. His latest failure is simply dazzling. With his encouragement, the Spanish Monarchists address a formal request to Franco asking for the restoration of the monarchy in the person of Don Juan. For a while it looks as if Franco will say yes. But hardly have the Nazis advanced twenty-five miles on the Russian front when he turns back to Hitler and visits disciplinary measures on the signers of the manifesto.

The Winged Skull

THIS IS LORENCE: A NARRATIVE OF THE REVEREND LAURENCE STERNE. By Lodwick Hartley. The University of North Carolina Press. $3.

DID the chaise break down under the broiling sun in a treeless waste near Toulouse, as Sterne wrote in a letter to his banker, or was it much earlier and more amusing, near Lyons, as he says in "Tristram Shandy," or were there two accidents? And why did he say in that book he decided to dash to France so suddenly it never entered his mind that England and France were at war, when plainly he had planned it long before, and had to get leave from his Bishop and ask for a safe conduct from Mr. Pitt? To say nothing of a twenty-pound loan from Mr. Garrick. Did he really get into bed with that long procession of shadowy ladies, from Catherine Fourmentelle early to Eliza Draper late, or did he just think and talk and write about it and make a great display of sentiment and then back out more or less gracefully at the right, or wrong, moment? Exactly how diabolic were those night-long frolics at Skelton Castle with his old friend Hall-Stevenson and the other demoniacs, squires and parsons as they mostly were? Were they imitating feebly the goings on of the Medmenham Monks, from which now and then John Wilkes strayed over to Skelton? Did he actually leave his mother to die in the workhouse (Byron thought so, and many before him and since), or did he care for her last days? Was his wife's belief, for a time, that she was the Queen of Bohemia due to his neglect and infidelities, or was it a strain of paranoia in that ill-starred mind? Was his mother really low Irish as he said, or member of a respectable Lancashire family? Just how deeply in love is a man who writes, through the years, substantially the same letters to a series of women, sometimes keeping copies for himself? Just where does truth end and fiction begin in Sterne's account of himself in "Tristram Shandy" and "The Sentimental Journey"?

Mr. Hartley wrestles manfully with these and a hundred other trivial or dubious or off-color questions of Laurence Sterne's career with a discretion and strait regard for the records that might surprise his subject, who, being a novelist, was hampered by no such scruples. An immense amount of devoted study and trained research appears to have gone into this fairly short book, which handles with ease a baffling complexity of detail and carries the story along swiftly and with concentration on several planes at once. It is only the tone I find a little troublesome at times; such a balancing of the evidence for and against, such a leveling down of both the good and the evil in the history of Sterne, almost succeeds in smoothing the man away. There is a smack of prudishness at times, small biased hints of moral disapproval dragged in by the ears as if under some compulsion not the author's own. Mr. Hartley confesses that one of his aims was to make the book palatable to the lay, or general, reader in the hope that this mysterious being may be encouraged to seek out "Tristram Shandy" and read it for himself. I never saw a general reader, but I am convinced he exists, so many books are written for him. It is a mistake, just the same; general reader should not be pampered in any such way; Laurence Sterne should not be arranged to advantage or disadvantage for his view; he should be made to take his chances along with the rest of us, not only with the available truths of life but also with the very best work the author can do. For this book, in spite of its placating foreword, will be a stiff introduction indeed to a reader who does not already know something of the period.

For one who knows "Tristram Shandy" "This Is Lorence" may bring to mind again how melancholy a cloud lies over all the recorded life of Laurence Sterne, even his triumphs and frolics, and how clear and merry the light shed by "Tristram Shandy." That book contains more living, breathing people you can see and hear, whose garments have texture between your finger and thumb, whose flesh is knit firmly to their bones, who walk about their affairs with audible footsteps, than any other one novel in the world, I do believe. Uncle Toby, Corporal Trim, Yorick and Mrs. Yorick, the Widow Wadman, Bridget, Dr. Slop, Susannah, Obadiah, the infant Tristram hovering between breeches and tunics, all live in one house with floor boards under their bootsoles, a roof over their heads, the fires burning and giving off real smoke, cooking smells coming from the kitchen, real weather outside and air blowing through the windows. When Dr. Slop cuts his thumb real blood issues from it, and everybody has a navel and his proper distribution of vital organs. One hangs around the place like an enchanted ghost, all eyes and ears for fear of missing something. The story roams apparently at random all over creation, following the living thoughts of these human beings in their infinitely varied experiences, memories, points of view. Sparks of association flash in showers at the slightest collision of temperaments. Every word spoken gets its instant response in the hearer; they are all intensely interested in each other and everything else under heaven all the time. Little clashes of wills lead to the most complicated roundabouts of personal history, anecdotes, opinion; a mere gesture is enough to set up a whole new train of thought and deed in these people, who live and go about their affairs every instant, not just at moments chosen by the author when it suits his convenience. Meanwhile, steadily, like time passing visibly before your eyes, Uncle Toby's unbroken devoted occupation with his campaigns, and the building of his fortified town, go on, accompanied by the most remarkable theories of military strategy and a running comment on the science of warfare, full of deep and sly satire. The celebrated comic improprieties go on too, a running fire of double talk punctuated by episodes such as that of the hot chestnut, the Abbess and the Novice who divided the sinful words which move a balky mule, the courtship of the Widow Wadman, the accidental circumcision of the newly born Tristram. It all has the most illusive air of having been dropped upon the paper by a flying pen which never stopped long enough for the author to read what he had written. Sterne drew on a page a few little graphs of his progress in "Tristram Shandy"; they are amusing but also accurate. That lightness was achieved with the intensity and painstakingness of a spider spinning its web, during those twenty obscure years as parson, along with the farming, and the philandering, and the wife driven distracted with jealousy, and the breaking blood vessels in his lungs, and the rows among his large family connection, and the local politics and the jollifications at Skelton Hall and the hunting and the August racing season at York.

Then his life work was published, a book or so at a time, and he went up modestly to London in the wake of Squire Crofts, a local worthy who paid the expenses of the trip, and there found scandalous fashionable success and enjoyed it enormously. Dr. Johnson thought his sermons "froth," Oliver Goldsmith found him dull, the Bishop of Gloucester called him "an irrecoverable scoundrel," but Sir Joshua Reynolds painted his portrait, David Garrick carried him into the orbit of the theater, the extremely mixed society around the Duke of York found him fascinating, for there was nothing they liked better than the cloven hoof peeping from beneath a cassock; he was in the dear tradition of the worldly abbé, and could write it all down, besides. Religion in any formal sense, and I greatly doubt any sense at all, he had not, and with some relief he ceased to feign it. He took some pains to be cultivated by respectable society, but what he loved best among even that was the fringe of wealthy young rakehells and their desperate sports. The rest is flight from death and pursuit of fame and pleasure: he "met" most of the great of his time, but his happiest days seem to have been a few weeks (when he had already the look of a dancing skeleton) of rioting around Paris with John Wilkes, interrupted, alas, by another blood vessel breaking at the height of the fun. As for women, to whom he gave so much attention, and who responded infallibly in their various ways, there is no fathoming his feelings or his motives. He appears to have squandered his whole available fund of human love upon his daughter Lydia, a headless, flighty creature ruled by her mother; judged by her story, she was the fine flower of all the weaknesses of every branch of all his families, a notably faulty lot. Even the highfaluting affair with Eliza Draper died, as all his fancies died, of his own weariness with his own role in them.

Mr. Hartley makes all the ladies rather duller than they may have been, even, but his wife must be admitted as a total loss. She was a homely woman whose husband made cruel caricatures of her, and wrote to a friend that he grew more sick and tired of her every day. She loved pleasure too, and had had a dull dog's life of it for years. She was delighted to get to France, and her ruses and stratagems to be allowed to stay on there, with her daughter and without her husband, would have been pitiable if they had not succeeded. But they did. Sterne died in lodgings in London, with the nurse and the landlady present, and a footman sent to inquire after him by John Crauford of Errol, who was giving a dinner to Garrick, Lord Ossory, David Hume, the Earl of March, Lord Roxburgh, the Duke of Grafton, and Mr. James, husband of Anne—the gay and good-hearted, who visited Sterne almost constantly in his last days. The footman reported to the waiting guests: "He was just a-dying . . . he said: now it is come. He put up his hand as if to stop a blow, and died in a minute."

His friends were saddened, but went on with their dinner. His wife and daughter and Eliza Draper were severally bitterly inconvenienced by his death. This and much more is in the book, but where is the real Laurence Sterne, the one who wrote "Tristram Shandy"? That winged skull seems to have made his getaway again, taking his main secret with him.

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

American Men of Letters

THE SHOCK OF RECOGNITION: THE DEVELOPMENT OF LITERATURE IN THE UNITED STATES RECORDED BY THE MEN WHO MADE IT. Edited by Edmund Wilson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

ONE has always wished that Edmund Wilson would do more with American literature than he has ever done: there are subjects there which he has never dealt with in his published criticism but which would lend themselves wonderfully to that admirable method of his, that method as of a Sainte-Beuve who has understood Freud or a Brandes who has understood Marx. What he has made of writers like James and Mrs. Wharton exacerbates one's impatience to know what he would make of Poe or Melville, of Thoreau or Whitman, of Henry Adams or Mark Twain.

This anthology does not allay one's impatience, naturally, but it is the beginning of an answer, and it suggests the hope that Wilson is about to write at some length on at least a half-dozen of our classic Dichter. The notion of the anthology itself is an extremely happy one: Wilson has brought together in this rather bulky volume a collection of pieces (essays, poems, even small books) by American writers—practicing artists themselves, not professional critics or reviewers—on other writers who were their fellow-countrymen; and from one to another, as Melville—whom he quotes—would say, runs the shock of recognition that men of genius detect, standing hand to hand in a circle. Fortunately Wilson has provided introductory notes to his selections, and these abound in his characteristic insights, discernments, éclaircissements. They are the tantalizing germs of imaginable full-scale essays.

For the most part the selections are unimpeachable. Here, quite properly, are Lowell's early and usually garbled essay on Poe, the whole of his "Fable for Critics," and his late and rather upstage essay on Thoreau; here are eleven of Poe's reviews, as no doubt they ought to be; here is Emerson's generous tribute to Thoreau, and (an inspiration) a collection of pieces that tell the whole story, the partly comic, partly touching story, of Emerson's and Whitman's fluctuating relations with each other. Everyone will rejoice that the whole of James's wonderfully delicate book on Hawthorne has been included, and indeed that Wilson has reprinted Henry Adams's bleak little book on George Cabot Lodge, since it tells something both about Henry Adams and about the New England mind of Lodge's very Novemberish era.

J. J. Chapman's astute study of Emerson, James's ever-so-slightly over-kind tribute to Howells, Eliot at something like his best on Hawthorne and James, Mencken at his very best, his most modulated best, on Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson's wistful letters to Van Wyck Brooks—none of these could be spared. And I for one would wish to own the book if only because Wilson has had the fine sense to violate his own American canon by including all of D. H. Lawrence's incomparable "Studies in Classic American Literature"—surely (despite the occasional intrusion into it of the Lawrence who suggests a cockney Keyserling and even a cockney Goebbels) the deepest-probing, the most intuitive, the most passionately felt book that any European has written on the subject. How many Americans, in fact, have sent down deeper bells into those waters?

Fortunately, too, the book will satisfy none of us completely, or it would be merely a "sound" and "balanced" job. Some of us will find Bayard Taylor's amusing parodies in "Diversions of the Echo Club" not really worth the space they occupy; will accept the inclusion of Mark Twain on Cooper only because it incites Wilson to say some wise things about the latter; will not find Dos Passos on "The Enormous Room" particularly memorable; and would have left out Amy Lowell's often snappy and spirited but terribly undiscriminating imitation of James Russell's "Fable for Critics." All this would have saved space for a few things one would have liked to slip in: for the sake of the "long foreground" Fenimore Cooper's letter on American writers in "Notions of the Americans," or (brief as it is) Hawthorne's review of "Typee," if only as a pendant to Melville's essay on Hawthorne (which is here), or something of Howells's on a younger writer (Fuller or Norris or whomever), or Ezra Pound on James or Eliot or W. C. Williams, or one of Conrad Aiken's sensitive essays in "Scepticisms," or Tate's fine essay on Hart Crane, or Glenway Wescott's homage to Fitzgerald. I would stubbornly hold out, also, for two or three of Margaret Fuller's reviews (surely she was something more than a professional reviewer); on Poe, on Hawthorne, on Emerson, on "American Literature" she had things to say that are still striking—if Poe's piece on Margaret Fuller is.

This, however, leads one into deep waters! Like all first-rate critics, Edmund Wilson can be magnificently wrong, illuminatingly wrong; and he is this, surely, on the subject of Poe. Most of his selections demonstrate it, though, as I say, one feels they ought to be here on other counts. "Intellectually," says Wilson of Poe, "he stands on higher ground than any other American writer of his time." The judgment leaves one breathless. At two or three points, no doubt, Poe generalized somewhat in advance of his day, but the mental soil beneath him was a quicksand, and who can forget the puerile upshot of his most serious poetic theorizing—the death of a beautiful woman as "the most poetical topic in the world"? To Hawthorne's talent Poe did fine justice, but he was almost without a sense of proportion, and month in, month out, he expended his energies mainly on the mice and minnows of the hour—the Thomas Wards and the P. C. Headleys and the Epes Sargeants whom no instructed person of the time gave a second thought to; he saw birds of paradise in a hundred house flies ("Mrs. Amelia Welby has nearly all the imagination of Maria del Occidente, with a more refined taste; and nearly all the passion of Mrs. Norton," etc., etc.). The high ground Poe really stood on was not the ground of the great critics, and the sources he drew on were far less conscious, less luminous, less "cultivated" than theirs: his sources were darker and wilder and bitterer, and they made him a beautiful minor romancer of suffering and fear. As a critic, he was never safely out of the mental purlieus of Orson Fowler or Nathaniel Parker Willis.

After which, one should note that Wilson's prefatory remarks about Poe are full of acute perceptions nevertheless. They are only the most discussible portion of an anthology that is richly discussible as a whole—and a savory foretaste of what may follow.

Napoleonic Ideas

NAPOLEON III. By Albert Guérard. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

AMONG the few lost causes that seem unlikely now to plague a resurgent France with claims and counterclaims, one may perhaps safely venture to list Bonapartism and the cult of Napoleon. Exponents of those related systems of political practice and theory, the uncle and the nephew, have shepherded the French people down the Hundred Days to Waterloo, through the Second Empire to the first battle of Sedan. Not even the phoenix—let alone the imperial eagles—could be expected to rise again from two such holocausts. The cult of the Emperor is dead, certainly. Forever now, amid its clustered battle flags, it lies enshrined under a block of red porphyry beneath the green dome of the Invalides; and when lately the Führer himself attempted to breathe life into the old bones of la gloire, this time by transferring the ashes of Napoleon II from the necropolis of the Hapsburgs to the banks of the Seine, the gesture went for nothing unless to show once more how inveterate is the German concern over mortuary arrangements. The mockery was too cruel even for Pétain.

And yet, upon reading Albert Guérard's challenging and thought-packed reappraisal of Louis Napoleon as a shaper of modern Europe—of that imperial adventurer's ruling ideas, rather than the train of compromises and wrong guesses that led to the demise of his regime—one wonders. The open-minded reader will be struck by, so to speak, the "nostalgia value" arising nowadays from the era 1848-70 in French life and thought; the Continental equivalent of the Victorian heyday across the Channel. Not the unshakable incubus of the French garrison at Rome, safeguarding the focus of reaction, haunting every step of the Emperor's efforts toward reform; not the blundering volleys in the Paris streets that turned the otherwise benign coup d'état of '51 into the crime commemorated by Victor Hugo, nor the stench of the Crédit Mobilier, nor the tragic Mexican gamble, nor the fatal miscalculation of Prussia's gathering strength—none of these cloudy misadventures can obscure the fact that life under Napoleon III in the City of Light not only glittered but was good.

Great nations have paid a higher toll to tyranny and have got less in return. One has only to regard an Offenbach and a Renan, living the good life freely (for the most part) in their divergent ways, to see the Bazaines and the Palikaos De Morny and the rest of the gilded troupe fall back into truer perspective. Says the author, "Criticism could be sharp and even bitter, if it remained courteous. Those keen-edged weapons, allusion and irony, recovered a favor and an effectiveness they had lost since the days of Voltaire. The fearless expression of delicate thought has two enemies: the dead silence imposed by a despot, and the universal tumult of full license; the second is worse. Not merely expression but thought itself is drowned by competitive bellowing; in the stillness of a jail a man can at least hear himself think. The Second Empire was neither a jail nor a pandemonium; men could reflect, and talk." As they talked, money came out of its hiding-place. There was technical progress in the departments, contentment over the teeming fields.

Held in check by their somnolent but strong-armed Emperor, then, and by the discreet ministrations of his alert police, the French were able to enjoy some twenty years of relief from confronting directly the political dilemma by which their republics appear fated to be split. The "Caesarian democracy" of Napoleon III, as practiced by him when diplomatic expediency and Caesar's health permitted, was based on the assumption that the people's will, by plebiscite, had found expression in the Emperor's person. This Napoleonic idea was by no means strictly new: in the words of the Imperial Uncle, "I am the nation's work. . . . The nation must uphold me." But its application under the nephew did bridge for a while the dreadful gulf that yawns in French political thought between the concepts of la patrie, which can be endangered from without, and le peuple, whose indignation from within may summon up the red specter of that third element, la foule, "the vile multitude," and set Frenchmen at one another's throats until they turn for salvation to the man on horseback.

As Professor Guérard reminds us, once Frenchmen had accepted le mot d'ordre from Louis Napoleon, they were told: "Liberty has never contributed to the foundation of a durable political edifice; when the edifice has been consolidated by time, liberty crowns it." Time, however, was not allowed to crown with liberty the edifice projected by Napoleon III. "The only political leader in the nineteenth century whose thought could still be a guide for us today"; such is Professor Guérard's estimate of one aspect of the man's personality. Yet time is the great enemy of all Caesars, howsoever democratic. When the ex-Emperor died at Chislehurst, less than three years after Sedan, he was contemplating, as unfortunate strong men must, a comeback (Gambetta's republic had proved a disappointment) and "was working on an economical stove for the poor." No legend had begun to take form around his suburban St. Helena; and gone from the political arena, to be implemented no more until Woodrow Wilson's day, was Louis Napoleon's unrealized ideal o an alternative to the "realistic" balance of power of Europ —the principle of self-determination.

Justice Holmes

THE MIND AND FAITH OF JUSTICE HOLMES: HI SPEECHES, ESSAYS, LETTERS, AND JUDICIA OPINIONS. Selected and Edited with Introduction an Commentary by Max Lerner. Little, Brown and Com pany. $4.

MAX LERNER has performed a service for America literature in "The Mind and Faith of Justice Holmes." He has brought together in one volume all that is mos characteristic of the Justice: occasional addresses and essay selections from "The Common Law," a sheaf of his letter as well as his principal opinions and dissents on the Suprem Judicial Court of Massachusetts and the Supreme Court c the United States. Lerner has provided a biographical sketc and a running commentary done with good taste and shrew insight. There emerges the portrait of a supremely civilize man, a judge, thinker, and artist of first rank.

Holmes brought a sophisticated mind to bear on our co stitutional law. He did for it what Freud did for psycholog He opened up its unconscious. He laid bare the unspoken an unprofessional premises, the respectably suppressed real m tivations, behind the formal parade and maneuver of jurist concepts. He divested these concepts of the absolute valu with which a naive jurisprudence had clothed them. Th devaluation was made possible by philosophic perspective an legal scholarship. Holmes looked at the law with a historian sense of continuity and change. He saw man with the indu gence of an anthropologist, society with the tolerance of skeptic. No one could have been less like the social reforme whose idol he became. They wished passionately to bett the world. He was willing to let them try because he didr think it mattered. His quarrel was with those who sought make the Constitution a Canute, and thus an annoyed arist crat found himself at the head of a procession of agitators, busybodies, idealists, and the humble.

The essence of Holmes's approach to constitutional law and the thoughts later polished into some of his most famous aphorisms may be found in his very first opinion on the United States Supreme Court. "It is true, no doubt," he wrote in Otis v. Parker, "that neither a state legislature nor a state constitution can interfere arbitrarily with private business or transactions. . . . But general propositions do not carry us far. While the courts must exercise a judgment of their own, it is by no means true that every law is void which may seem to the judges who pass upon it excessive, unsuited to its ostensible end, or based upon considerations of morality with which they disagree. Considerable latitude must be allowed for differences of view. . . . Otherwise a constitution, instead of embodying only relatively fundamental rules of right . . . would become the partisan of a particular set of ethical or economical opinions." This was not said, as the reader may imagine, in dissent but for the majority. And that majority within two years was forcefully to demonstrate how true it is that "general propositions do not decide concrete cases." For the general principles they were willing to accept in 1903 to validate a California provision against short selling were abandoned in 1905 when New York sought to enact a ten-hour law for bakeries. For thirty years the Supreme Court was, in fact, to enshrine "a particular set of ethical or economical opinions," the theory of laissez faire, in the Constitution long after it had been riddled with exceptions or abandoned in economics, business practice, and (covertly) in legislation.

Holmes, in a famous address on Marshall, said that "a great man represents a great ganglion in the nerves of society . . . a strategic point in the campaign of history." This is true of Marshall. It is not the measure of Holmes's greatness. A collection of Marshall's opinions is of interest principally to the historian and lawyer. Holmes was not only a great judge, a greater one than Marshall, but a poet and a philosopher who was fated like Cardozo to work in the harsh and uncongenial medium of the law. Holmes's first feelings and doubts about the law may be found expressed in some of his later speeches. "One found oneself plunged in a thick fog of details," he said, "in a black and frozen night, in which there were no flowers, no spring, no easy joys." "How can the laborious study of a dry and technical system," he asked in another speech, "the greedy watch for clients and practice of shopkeepers' art, the mannerless conflicts over often sordid interests, make out a life?" "If a man has the soul of Sancho Panza," was his answer, "the world to him will be Sancho Panza's world . . . to those who believe with me that not the least godlike of man's activities is the large survey of causes, that to know is not less than to feel, I say . . . that a man may live greatly in the law as well as elsewhere; that there as well as elsewhere his thought may find its unity in an infinite perspective; that there as well as elsewhere he . . . may drink the bitter cup of heroism, may wear his heart out after the unattainable."

It is worth learning a little law to read Holmes, as it is worth learning a little Latin to read Horace. In the work Lerner has brought together one will find the joy to be derived from a noble prose, the consolation to be drawn from an equally noble philosophy. In one of the letters in this volume Holmes says of Kant and Hegel, "They each had profound aperçus here and there, and these were their real contributions, and the world would have been less bothered and bored if they had stopped with them." Holmes offers the aperçus without the system. He cultivated brevity, and he was too wise and had too good a sense of humor to attempt to tailor the universe. Holmes was a stoic in philosophy. He did not have what Lerner called the "illusion of centrality." Few men have lived as completely as he in a Copernican universe. He did not need the constructions, theological, ethical, or metaphysical, which most men require to shield the brevity of their lives from the cold winds of the infinite. He once wrote William James that he thought "the demands made of the universe" even by so secular a system as pragmatism "too nearly the Christian demands without the scheme of salvation. I long ago made up my mind that all that one needed was a belief in the significance of the universe. And more lately it has come to seem to me that even that might be ambiguous." Thirty years later he wrote to his Chinese friend Wu, "We must be serious in order to get work done; but when the usual Saturday half-holiday comes I see no reason why we should not smile at the trick by which nature keeps us at our job."

This is too adult and austere a philosophy. It would be a mistake to believe that even Holmes could live by it. Though he was without illusions on the intellectual plane, he was not without their comfort on the emotional. Holmes was a romantic, and relished himself as spectacle, as do all poets. One might venture a pun at the expense of Santayana and say that Holmes's real philosophy was compounded of romanticism and animal faith. He was a lover in all senses of the term. There is that grandly boastful letter in adolescence to William James in which he says that there "are not infrequent times when a bottle of wine, a good dinner, and a girl of some trivial sort can fill the hour for me." There is another sixty years later in which Holmes writes of Cardozo that he has "noticed such a sensitive delicacy in him that I tremble lest I should prove unworthy of his regard. . . . I believe he is a great and beautiful spirit." So was Holmes. To read him is not only to enrich one's understanding of the law as the crossroads at which man and society meet but to share the gusto, the gaiety, and the wonder he felt for existence. This, the essence of poetry, is not the less precious when largely distilled, as Lerner has distilled it, from the forbidding and regimented rows of the "United States Supreme Court Reporter."

Our Eastern Enemy

MY WAR WITH JAPAN. By Carroll Alcott. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

THIRTY SECONDS OVER TOKYO. By Captain Ted W. Lawson. Random House. $2.

FEW Americans have had such an opportunity as Carroll Alcott's to study Japanese character at its worst. He lived in Shanghai for thirteen years working on English-language newspapers and, in the four years before Pearl Harbor, broadcasting. The seamy side of Shanghai fascinated him:

he was more than a crime reporter; he was a connoisseur of the underworld. He delved into the racketeering system by which beggars had to pay tribute to their "king," who in turn had to pay tribute to the overlord of Shanghai gangsters. It was Mr. Alcott who discovered that the Anti-Kidnapping Society, which advertised its ability to protect rich Chinese from abduction, actually was organized for the purpose of spotting rich men for kidnapers. He was a passionate student of counterfeiting, murder, narcotic peddling, gun-running, smuggling of various sorts, and the arts of gang terrorism.

The crime trails all led to the Japanese army, which was systematically promoting every species of lawlessness, partly for the profit and partly to add to the general chaos preparatory to conquest. The Japanese, by improved gangster methods, took over and expanded the illicit trade in opium and heroin, for instance, and derived a monthly revenue in the Nanking and Shanghai areas which Mr. Alcott estimated at $20,000,000, Chinese; this the Japanese converted into American money to buy scrap iron and oil. In December, 1940, the Japanese army threw a military blockade around a quarter of a million Chinese living just outside the International Settlement; Chinese died by hundreds from hunger and cold, and the corpses were strewn about the streets for weeks. Mr. Alcott found out the reason for the blockade: the owners of the gambling dens in the district had refused to pay an extra assessment of tribute to the Japanese commanding general.

The more Mr. Alcott probed into these matters the angrier the Japanese became. They tried to kill him by bomb and by simple shooting. One evening when he was going to the radio station and had given his bodyguard the night off, uniformed Japanese almost succeeded in kidnapping him. Thereafter he had two armed guards with him at all times and wore a bullet-proof vest. This was in 1940, when the United States and Japan were at peace, or at least Americans thought so. The Japanese knew better; Pearl Harbor merely marked a new phase in a war which they had been fighting all along.

The blindness of England and America to Japan's continuing war upon them through the years before Pearl Harbor was attributable not solely to stupidity but also to greed, Mr. Alcott suggests. For many years British and American commercial interests had been betting on the wrong horse; they thought that a strong Japan might bring order to the Orient and that markets would then be opened up. Ignoring the two thousand years of Chinese culture, England and America encouraged the Japanese barbarians instead of helping with the unification of China.

Mr. Alcott's book builds up a picture of Japanese deception and brutality beyond comprehension. Reading Mr. Alcott—who tells his incredible story in a matter-of-fact way, with grim humor, never ranting—one comes to think that the Nazis are pleasant, civilized people by comparison with their Far Eastern ally. "My War with Japan" is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the Pacific enemy.

Whereas Mr. Alcott had thirteen years of experience with the Japanese, Captain Lawson had just thirty seconds; fortunately he did not meet any face to face or he would not have been able to tell the tale of the Doolittle bombing raid on Tokyo. And what a tale it is! For pure adventure and high excitement this story ranks right at the top of the war books.

Captain Lawson had no idea what the mission was to be when he was in training for it in Florida in March, 1942. Not until the second day out in the Pacific aboard the aircraft carrier Hornet were he and the other seventy-nine fliers told that they were to bomb the cities of Japan. They were to have taken off 400 miles from the coast, flown over Tokyo at night, and landed at dawn in China. Because a Japanese boat sighted them and thereby endangered the whole expedition, they took off 800 miles from the coast, dropped their bombs at noon, and reached the China coast at dusk.

At that point they ran into thick weather. The question was whether to fly at 10,000 feet until their gas ran out and then parachute to earth, or whether to fly at 50 feet and hunt a beach to land on. Captain Lawson, the pilot, chose the latter alternative; but both engines failed and the plane crashed into the sea, throwing out him and the other four crew members. Captain Lawson's face was bashed in and his leg ripped open; the other four were injured less severely, but only one was able to walk.

American

THIS NEW BOOK is especially designed for Americans whose native tongue is German. You can help your foreign-born friends by giving it to them. It will tell them things you'd hesitate to tell them to their faces, things they need to know for their comfort and success.

Most German-speaking people in America—even those who have been here a long time—still sound awkward and feel ill-at-ease in their new country. They are forever saying things like "already once again," or committing obvious little social blunders like shaking hands too much. They don't understand our attitudes—toward superiors, toward employees, toward professional and business colleagues. So many of our everyday turns of speech weren't included in their textbooks. As a result, they still talk and act like foreigners.

The contents: Part 1. Speaking and Writing Colloquial American English — an informal guide to American grammar and slang, including a list of 100 errors that Germans are forever making. Part 2. Social Forms and Customs—how to avoid errors when introducing people, sending flowers, writing letters, etc. Part 3. Fiction in Review

IN DEFERENCE to the popular superstition that summer is the time to catch up on the reading one failed to do in the year, I am devoting this week's space to a quick survey of the novels that might possibly be recommended for vacation consumption. While of course I can make no claim to have read every work of fiction published in the last twelve months (such notable books as Ignazio Silone's "The Seed Beneath the Snow," Anna Seghers's "The Seventh Cross," and Isak Dinesen's "Winter's Tales" were commented on by other reviewers in these pages), I think I saw the majority of novels that made any claim to seriousness or even literacy—at any rate, a sufficient number to enable me to pass some sort of judgment as to the quality of current fiction. What that judgment is may be inferred from the very small number of volumes I can even "possibly" recommend. And I find it interesting that of the books which achieved some measure of popular success in the last year, only two—Howard Fast's "Citizen Tom Paine" and Helen Howe's "The Whole Heart"—appear on this lamentably short list. Evidently books which other readers found enlightening or enjoyable I found meretricious or dull. But this works the other way round as well, and perhaps I can call attention to a small handful of books which, at least comparatively, are worth more notice than they received.

To my taste, then, the best fiction I read this past year was a collection of Latin American short stories, "Fiesta in November," edited by Angel Flores and Dudley Poore, with an introduction by Katherine Anne Porter. Prejudiced against primitivism in any of the contemporary arts, I admit that I came to "Fiesta in November" prepared to find it quite self-consciously outside the international literary tradition; but while these short stories could have been written nowhere but in Central or South America, they accept their whole responsibility in the world. Necessarily their major concern is with primitive people, but these Latin American writers are in the best sense of the word sophisticated, and their stories are full of the effort, not of artfulness, but of art.

The most serious and in some ways most talented novel of our own country was Ira Wolfert's "Tucker's People," which I reviewed at length only three weeks ago and mention again merely for the record; it is a story of the numbers racket in Harlem, but an infinitely more interesting book than this subject matter would indicate. Slater Brown's "The Burning Wheel" and Paul Horgan's "The Common Heart" may neither of them have been as impressive as "Tucker's People," but actually they were both rather more enjoyable reading than Mr. Wolfert's novel, and both certainly deserved wider audiences than they won. Mr. Brown has that first instinct of a novelist, to write about people; "The Burning Wheel" is about the relationship between a group of Connecticut farmers and the city people who buy summer places in their countryside; the novel is modest in scope but dramatic and deeply thoughtful. "The Common Heart" also springs from a truly novelistic feeling for character; written in a fine, simple prose, it is the story of a group of everyday people who live in the Southwest, and it has a pair of the most convincing little-boy characters I have come across in contemporary fiction. You will be acquainted with Mr. Horgan's satiric gifts from his earlier novels, but unfortunately in "The Common Heart" his bite is softened by a certain piety.

Of the two novels already mentioned on which my opinion pretty much coincides with popular opinion (for I regret that I find little to commend in such best-sellers as Marcia Davenport's "The Valley of Decision," Nancy Hale's "Prodigal Women," or Joseph Freeman's "Never Call Retreat" except their effort—they are all such long books), I liked Howard Fast's "Citizen Tom Paine" rather less than his "The Unvanquished," published last summer, but I still think Mr. Fast the only historical novelist writing at the present time whose books are a pleasure to read; and I found Helen Howe's intelligent and self-effacing first novel, "The Whole Heart," a most welcome change from the undisciplined self-indulgence of so much current fiction. It has been called to my attention that Mr. Fast distorts or ignores many of the known facts of Tom Paine's life; if I nevertheless repeat my favorable judgment of his novel, I wish it to be clear that it is not because I repudiate a historical novelist's obligation to historical scholarship, but simply because I myself am too little scholarly to have been troubled by Mr. Fast's errors. "The Whole Heart," Miss Howe's account of a Boston gentleman's relation with politics and with the four women in his life, is lively, witty, and decent—worth reading, if for nothing else, for Miss Howe's annihilating portrait of an all too typical American college girl.

In the line of annihilating portraits, I enormously enjoyed Dawn Powell's "A Time to Be Born" for its satire, though not for its sentimental love story; Miss Powell has yet to write the whole book that is up to the best parts of what she has already written. Also witty and intelligent was Jerre Mangione's "Mount Allegro," a series of family reminiscences in the style of the New Yorker and the best of several accounts of Italian-American life published in the past year. There was a serious and promising first novel called "The White Queen" by Betty Baur and an interesting though less promising first novel about life on a destroyer, "East of Farewell," by a young naval ensign, Howard Hunt. Barry Fleming's "Colonel Effingham's Raid" was better politics than fiction (but this is no faint praise in these days of fictional politics), and Caroline Slade's "Lilly Crackell" was better sociology than fiction. As a change from people, I can conclude this sad little report by recommending Vardis Fisher's "The Darkness and the Deep," a novel of apes.

NOTICE TO OUR READERS

Restrictions on July paper shipments, controlled by the War Production Board of the United States and the War Prices and Trade Board of Canada, have temporarily delayed our regular paper receipts for this month. Neither The Nation nor the mill is responsible for this situation.

Because of the delay we are obliged to hold to 32 pages our Midsummer Book Number, originally planned for 40 pages. We have found it necessary, for that reason, to eliminate the Puzzle and Letters to the Editors. Additional reviews and a one-act play by Bertold Brecht, scheduled for the book number, will appear in early issues.

I ONLY hope Major de Seversky and Walt Disney know what they are talking about, for I suspect an awful lot of people who see "Victory Through Air Power" are going to think they do. Certainly I am not equipped to argue with them. I have the feeling I was sold something under pretty high pressure, which I don't enjoy, and I am staggered by the ease with which such self-confidence, on matters of such importance, can be blared all over a nation, without cross-questioning. Beyond that, I can only talk of it as a certain kind of moving picture.

When Disney is attending strictly to mechanics and to business, it is good poetry and, barring its overpersuasiveness, good teaching. When, instead, he is being poetic, or cute, or in this case funny, it is neither. Such images as that of the Nazi wheel are vivid and instructive. Such images as that of the bird which nests in a Maginot gunmouth are the defective side of this notably split talent or composite of talents. The human animations, like all of Disney's, are so bad they become interesting as misanthropic footnotes. The real poetic energy in Disney's films has always come of the children and grandchildren of his basic metaphors—the sounds and images of impingement, for instance, as the Nazi wheel is assaulted—and usually these are finely detailed and polished. Here they are not much more than roughed-in. The non-musical sound is good without his occasional brilliance; the music is a loss. The color undersea (as in Disney's forest glades, etc.—there is something fishy about either him or me) is subdued and quite pretty; the extroverted color is so much loud candy, if candy were to develop aesthetic pretensions. The patronizing comic cuteness with which early aviation is treated and the gay dreams of holocaust at the end seem to me as ill-advised as the finely mechanized expository stuff between them is new and correct.

I noticed, uneasily, that there were no suffering and dying enemy civilians under all those proud promises of bombs; no civilians at all, in fact. Elsewhere, the death-reducing virtues of De Seversky's scheme—if he is right—are mentioned; but that does not solve the problem. It was necessary here either (1) to show bombed civilians in such a manner as to enhance the argument, (2) to omit them entirely, or (3) to show them honestly, which might have complicated an otherwise happy sales talk. I am glad method 1 was not used, and of method 3 I realize that animated cartoons, so weak—at least as Disney uses them—in the whole human world, would be particularly inadequate to human terror, suffering, and death. Even so, I cannot contentedly accept the antiseptic white lies of method 2. The sexless sexiness of Disney's creations has always seemed to me queasy, perhaps in an all-American sense; in strict descent from it is this victory-in-a-vacuum which is so morally simple a matter—and so salubrious for the postwar if only it were true—of machine-eat-machine.

At last I saw "The Ox-Bow Incident." I also saw "Bataan." Between the two of them there is a great deal one might talk about on the difficult question of the proper and the incestuous relationship, in any work of art or entertainment, between nature and artifice. After a good deal of effort to get it on to paper and into feasible space, I'm afraid it is wiser to give up, saying only as follows. "Ox-Bow" is one of the best and most interesting pictures I have seen for a long time, and it disappointed me. "Bataan" is incomparably less of a picture, and I liked it very much. It seems to me that in "Ox-Bow" artifice and nature got jammed in such a way as to give a sort of double focus, like off-printing in a comic strip. Here was a remarkably controlled and intelligent film; and in steady nimbus, on every detail, was the stiff over-consciousness of those who made it of the excellence of each effect, to such a degree that the whole thing seemed a mosaic of over-appreciated effects which continually robbed nature of its own warmth and energy, and the makers of the ambitious claims which they had made on nature. This complicatedness of attitude, as I infer it, accounts for occasional flagrant mistakes, like the phonily gnarled lynching tree or the angelic soprani which are used as motif for the Negro preacher; and accounts also for unluckier, more intrinsic flaws than those—for the literariness and theatricality, the essential patronage and indirect self-pity, which braid and infuse the best of the show. Henry Fonda is a good median example. His performance is the most sympathetic of his career; and beneath it his personal fondness for "the part" and his awareness how to temper his mannerisms to an unshorn wind show like several inches of slip. If I seem to be going out of my way to find faults to explain what was chiefly a troubling of intuition—and I'm afraid I may be—let me at least pay my respects to this film by adding that I find the same arteriosclerotic fault-of-attitude harming still better things—nearly all the good writing of this century, the films of Pudovkin and Pabst, and some of the music of Brahms.

But not in Mozart, and not, far down the scale, in "Bataan." Its claims on nature are modest enough to be almost shamefully safe, being only those which a certain kind of melodrama can dare to claim; and from there on what still might have been very bad becomes instead a small triumph of pure artifice. And that becomes possible, I think, thanks again to creative attitude. The people who made this film, I judge, were lucky enough to believe in it so warmly and innocently that the small area they staked out in nature remained at the fertile center of their affection, and their cinematic intelligence and skill—with none left over for self-congratulation from the sidelines—were released entirely to the proper business of embodiment. What they had to embody was as formal and naive as a pulp story. Thirteen men defend a bridgehead against hopeless odds. Like their number, their types and their troubles and their deaths are conclusions so foregone that to try to freshen them by tampering and basic invention would have been a deep aesthetic mistake (again, as with Disney, the power of the secondary and tertiary metaphor). The mistake was not made. The story was simply put into patient and fecund detail, excellently written, acted, photographed, paced, above all directed (by Tay Garnett) into something as perfectly artificial, and as strongly rooted also in nature, as good ballet or, in another aspect, Italian opera, which like the pulp story has a large believing, yet critical audience. It seems to me irrelevant to criticism on any other grounds so long as it ventures on to no other grounds. I have heard "Bataan" criticized for presuming so shallowly to portray war. But I think it much less shallow than most of the more ambitious war pictures, which are indeed insults both to the men who make real war and to the men who made the images. We may not yet recognize the tradition, but it is essentially, I think, not a drama but a certain kind of native ritual dance. As such its image of war is not only naive, coarse-grained, primitive; it is also honest, accomplished in terms of its aesthetic, and true.

Eric Ambler's stories are not yet getting very good breaks on the screen. Orson Welles's "Journey into Fear" had sophistication without much journeying, in the kinesthetic sense of the word, still less fear. "Background to Danger" has plenty of danger, in lively motion at that, without a background keenly drawn enough to make it really dangerous. Short of the really "creative" men, Raoul Walsh is one of my favorite directors; but—besides thoroughly enjoying it—you could use this film for one kind of measurement of the unconquerable difference between a good job by Hitchcock and a good job of the Hitchcock type.

There is still doubt—and should be none—about the American release of two English "documentaries," both of which deserve better than that rubber truncheon of a categorizer. "World of Plenty," about past, present, and future food, was energetically and well written by the late Eric Knight and surprisingly (to me) well edited by Paul Rotha, with some adroit pedagogical help from the Isotype Institute and a general boldness of ideology which I would like to see cutting grease in as many American theaters as possible. "The Silent Village" is a reenactment by Welsh miners of the story of the mining village of Lidice. The unobstreperous sensitiveness of those who made it and the fistlike authenticity, dignity, and seriousness of those who performed in it make this an expiation for every odious advantage which has been taken of that village. It is a question, probably a sad one, whether any group of miners in this country would have been capable of it.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

WISHING to avoid Schuman's "Newsreel" and Harris's "Ode to Truth," which Morton Gould conducted first at his July 4 Stadium concert, I tuned in late, and missed the beginning of the Suite from Copland's music for "Billy the Kid." Most of it turned out to be excellent music to listen to without the ballet—the music of the card game being especially beautiful; but some of it—for the episode of the girls in red tights, and for the gun battle—needed the action to have point. This music might have been omitted; and certainly the music of the pas de deux should have been included.

As for Mr. Gould, in my limited experience of his music I have found him to be at his best when he is deftly, expertly, but unpretentiously diverting, as in the "Guaracho" Overture which the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe played before "Rodeo," and in the opening section of the second movement of the American Symphonette No. 2 which he conducted at the Stadium. His serious Lincoln piece which Toscanini broadcast last fall was terrible; and in the rest of the Symphonette the attempt to divert is driven too hard and is carried out with too much technical expertness and cleverness.

At Toscanini's mid-June broadcast with the N. B. C. Symphony I thought I discovered what was behind the pace for the first part of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" that is strikingly faster than the one other conductors take. It happened to be the first time that I had followed his performance with a score; and as it went along I noticed Debussy's directions for tempo: "Very moderate" for the beginning; "Becoming more animated" for the approach to the middle part; "First rate of movement" and "Same movement, very sustained" for the middle part; "Movement of the beginning" for the return of the first part. The first part and the return of the first part were, then, to be taken at the same pace; and Toscanini, unlike other co ductors, was obeying this directio
They take the first part more slow than the return; he brings the pace the first part up to that of the retu (since the wider spacing out of t flute theme in the return makes a slow pace for the return impossible).

Other unusual tempos of Toscanin have reasons of this sort behind ther
I am sure. I have the impression, f example, that it is his desire to esta lish, in accordance with Beethoven's a Schubert's directions, a single unifyi tempo for the various sections of t second movements of Beethoven's Se enth and Schubert's C major Symph nies that produces tempos which a unusually fast for their opening sectio —too fast for some listeners, but n for me. And years ago, when he play Brahm's First Symphony for the fir time in New York, he seemed to ha decided that the Poco sostenuto intr duction to the first movement and t
Poco sostenuto reference back to it the end of the movement should be the same tempo; and that since the o at the end could not move at the tra tional slow pace of the one at the b ginning, the one at the beginning wou have to move as fast as the one at t end. In all three or four performanc of the work that season he stuck to th consistency and to the excessively fa pace for the introduction; but the ne season the Poco sostenuto introductic was taken at the traditionally slow pace than the reference back to it the end of the movement.

I will not be surprised if the sa thing happens with Haydn's Sympho
No. 94, which he played at the rece broadcast. As far as I can recall, it w his first performance of the work in th country; and it had the mercurial mov ment, the sharpness of contour and i flection that make his performance
Haydn so marvelous. But the minuet– for reasons which I was unable to unde stand—was speeded up to an unprec dented pace that was obviously too fa for the internal relations of the musi and a strain on the orchestra. It will interesting to see what he does wi that minuet next year, and ten yea from now.

The Shape of Things

IT IS A HEARTENING EXPERIENCE TO TURN back to the headlines of a year ago. Then the British were standing with their backs to the wall at El Alamein and the Russians were retreating towards the Don as the second Nazi summer offensive gathered momentum. In the Pacific the Japanese had met defeat at Midway but still held the initiative and still threatened Australia. Today it is Japan that is struggling to hold its far-flung outposts at a steadily mounting cost, particularly in ships and planes. In Russia the Nazis, seeking to stage one more offensive, have been stopped in short order and now find themselves hard put to resist a powerful Soviet counter-attack. Finally, in the Mediterranean the Axis is at long last suffering the pains and terrors of invasion. Within a week of the Allied landings one quarter of Sicily has been overrun. As we write, a decisive battle for Catania is being waged, and if this stronghold falls, there can no longer be any doubt about the outcome of the campaign. The Allied operations have been brilliantly conceived and meticulously organized, and, it is clear, we have developed a punch which has both surprised and shaken the enemy. In fact, the Italian backbone is visibly cracking as invasion of the mainland becomes an early probability.

MUSSOLINI'S TOTTERING REGIME IS BEING subjected to political as well as military assault, and the question of how long it can survive has ceased to be academic. Seldom in war has there been a greater opportunity for skilled political strategy. But such a strategy, to be fully effective, must be constructive, and the weakness of the joint ultimatum delivered to the people of Italy by the President and Mr. Churchill is its rather negative appeal. It correctly seeks to drive a wedge between the Italians and their fascist oppressors and warns that the sole hope of survival lies in "honorable capitulation." But there is no suggestion of what sort of government will succeed that of Mussolini; no positive hope extended of a chance for Italians to choose their own rulers. This kind of appeal may encourage piecemeal surrenders; it might even foster a palace revolution; it will not light the spark of revolt in a dispirited and hungry people. Nor do we believe that the workers and peasants will find much inspiration in the military government we have installed in Sicily—presumably as a model of what is in store for the whole of Italy. Inevitably such an administration must operate through the local authorities, and since all Italian office-holders had to be members of the party, this means we shall be dependent on the cooperation of Fascists, even though the party itself is to be suppressed. It is difficult to see how this situation could be avoided altogether, but we ought to take steps quickly to fill the political vacuum which will exist in Italy with the overthrow of the Fascists. We can hardly make progress in this direction by prohibiting all political activity and refusing to deal with exiled anti-Fascists.

IN THE CURIOUS ARGOT OF AMERICAN diplomacy Admiral Robert of Martinique has "expressed a desire to relinquish his authority." Translated, this means that Vichy's last viceroy in the Americas has been starved out of his hole. The State Department's cryptic announcement about Robert was forthright simplicity compared with its comments on his successor, Henri-Etienne Hoppenot, who was designated by the French Committee of National Liberation. Accepting Hoppenot's authority—indeed utilizing that authority to secure American military interests in the Caribbean zone—the State Department is careful to divorce its profitable recognition of the appointee from the faintest suspicion that it recognizes those who appointed him. The acceptance of Hoppenot's designation, reads the announcement, "is not to be construed as affecting either pro or con the question of this government's relations with the French Committee of National Liberation." In short, the action is not to be construed. It is to be left suspended in that fog of unreality which conceals even from the President the truth that the French Empire, with 40,000,000 inhabitants, is a fighting ally, that it is administered by a committee, sitting in Algiers, with at least as much claim to recognition as the exiled government of Poland, sitting in London. In this same fog our allies are beginning to lose sight of us altogether. From London Geoffrey Parsons, Jr., reports to the New York Herald Tribune the disappointment of the British and Russian governments over our refusal to join in a three-power recognition of the Algiers committee. "Being patient allies," he writes, "the British and Russians have withheld action while hoping that a revelation of reality and common sense might strike Washington." If we were the State Department we would construe this as con.

A GOOD MANY GOOD PEOPLE THINK THAT the President's rebuke to Messrs. Wallace and Jones will prove a healthy tonic to a divided and bickering Administration. They say the President, having issued instructions against the airing of official disagreements, "had to" do just what he did. With this interpretation we disagree. It seems to us to ignore the political reality behind the administrative façade—the struggling for control between the most conservative group in the government and the group which is trying to use the federal machinery to hasten the winning of the war even at the expense of the guaranties and safeguards which big business has generally tried to exact as the price of cooperation. The Vice-President would never have attacked Mr. Jones openly if the President had backed up with action his verbal support of Wallace and the Board of Economic Warfare. Instead of doing so, he not only let Wallace carry the ball but failed to provide the necessary interference. It was suggested in a résumé of the case by Jack Beall in the New York Herald Tribune last Sunday that Mr. Wallace had "taken up" with the President the advisability of making a public attack on Mr. Jones, although he had not checked "the actual contents of his statement." But even assuming that the President was genuinely surprised and felt that he had to admonish the adversaries, we still believe he could have done it in a way that would not have jettisoned a vigorous New Deal agency and turned its functions over to a reactionary henchman of Mr. Jones—while continuing the latter in financial control. The fact that he presented this major victory to his chief opponents seems sure proof that today political appeasement is the President's own guiding directive.

PRODIGAL JOHN L. LEWIS IS ABOUT TO return to the paternal mansion. The fatted calf—perhaps in this case the Progressive Mine Workers of Illinois—is ready, and the benedictions have been amply rehearsed. Those who fear that labor's bad boy is returning home with the idea of standing Father William on his head and taking over the house have relied on Dan Tobin of the Teamsters' Union to bar the way. The reliance proves to have been misplaced. Mr. Tobin, one of the New Deal's most ardent champions within the American Federation of Labor, not only welcomes Lewis in the name of unity but has some pretty harsh things to say about "political office-holders who interfere in any way in the cementing of the labor movement." It seems strangely unclear to Tobin and other Federation officials that nothing could be more calculated to prevent unity between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. than the success of Prodigal John's maneuver. It is not at all far-fetched to suppose in fact that this is one of his prime objectives. The man who broke away from the Federation to found the C. I. O. and then broke away from the C. I. O. when he lost caste is clearly a devotee of power, not unity. His present plans, we suspect, have more to do with building an anti-New Deal political machine than with "cementing the labor movement." What prompts Tobin to accept Lewis's bid at face value is anybody's guess. James A. Wechsler of PM reports that with the prospect of reen's imminent retirement from the presidency of the ederation, Tobin emerges as a leading candidate. "He uld not be licked," Wechsler adds, "with Lewis's cking."

HE ARGENTINE GOVERNMENT'S ACTIONS ntinue to speak louder than its words. A Fourth of ly speech by Foreign Minister Seguno Storni hailing e solidarity of the American nations persuaded some our more Pollyanna-like correspondents and commen- tors to begin hanging out the flag. "The Argentine epublic," said Storni, "will stand with the other Ameri- n nations in all those fields to which she is summoned her commitments of honor and by her duties of pan- merican cooperation." A few days later the wishful inkers were still more encouraged by a letter addressed Storni to Alberto Guani, chairman of the Emergency dvisory Committee for Political Defense of the Hemi- here. This announced the appointment of an Argentine ter-ministerial committee to examine the relation be- veen Resolutions Nos. 1 and 17 of the Rio conference. o. 1 recommended rupture of relations with the Axis owers; No. 17 dealt with subversive activities. The task the inter-ministerial committee was to examine the ossibility of giving full effect to the second without reviously carrying out the first. The fact that the ques- on of implementing No. 1 was brought up at all gave se to hopeful suggestions that the Ramirez government as about to jump on our side of the fence. Since then, owever, the fascist regime in Buenos Aires has fooled e optimists by its own interpretation of "subversive ctivities." For while it has suppressed the Nazi Federa- on of Welfare and Cultural Clubs, it has also cracked own on eight pro-United Nations societies on the round that they have been infiltrated by "Communists." he excuse will seem thin enough to everyone except oebbels and Martin Dies, especially in the case of the cción Argentina, whose 400,000 members include the ost respected names in the country. Meanwhile most of e pro-Nazi groups continue to operate undisturbed.

RENCH CULTURE MAY BE IN TEMPORARY clipse, but French couture still carries on, according to me Dieudonné Coste, who managed to "escape" from azi-controlled Paris last September with several trunks ull of it. Mme Coste, who herself provides complete roof that clothes make the woman, gave a spirited pic- ure of a "valiant Paris" where "gay parties . . . go to ongchamps and the races just as they used to," where omen bravely "start out in the morning in the dress hey intend to keep on all day. . . . At night they ride the theater or restaurant wearing a dress that may parkle lightly with sequins." The names in Mme Coste's ll of those who are keeping up the morale of Paris, nder Nazi auspices, are well known—Maggie Rouff, Piguet, Balenciaga, Lelong, Alix, Paquin. And Mme Coste eagerly displayed some of their wares—a white satin Balenciaga with full skirt appliquéed with red violet flowers, a pink jersey Alix, an evening jacket from Piguet. She didn't say how she had managed to get her treasures past the Nazi-guarded frontier; she did say that "much of the skirt fulness is going to the back." We are fascinated by Mme Coste's revelations; we could wish, however, that she had told us more about underground fashions in the City of Light. We should like to know, for instance, what the anti-Fascist Parisienne wears when she starts out bravely in the morning, her eyes lightly sparkling with the knowledge that she may be in Nazi custody by night. But obviously Mme Coste never rode on the underground.

Why the Whitewash?

THE statement issued by Under Secretary of War Patterson on the situation at the Wright Aeronautical Corporation is unworthy of an official who has often in the past shown himself forthright and independent. Its net effect is to disparage the findings of the Truman committee and to whitewash the procedure inside the Army Air Corps. It may, indeed, be true that conditions at the Lockland, Ohio, plant were "much less sensational than some of the inferences drawn in recently published statements." But improvement is more likely to come from a straight admission of abuses uncovered than an attempt to gloss over the facts. Public criticism will be good for both the company and the inspection corps, and it is easy to believe Senator Truman's retort that his committee's conclusions were "exceedingly temperate" in the light of the 1,286 pages of sworn testimony on which they were based.

The fact is that the Patterson statement, whether the Under Secretary realizes it or not, is but the latest and most important of a series of steps taken by the army bureaucracy to keep the facts or at least their full import from the public. The first was when Brigadier General Bennett E. Meyers of the Army Air Force assured the Truman committee that nothing irregular was going on at the plant. It was after these assurances that the committee in its own hearings discovered that tests were being falsified, records destroyed, and inspection reports forged to enable the company to get by with defective and substandard parts and engines. The committee found that honest army inspectors were browbeaten and punished by higher-ups for doing their duty. It accuses Lieutenant Colonel Frank C. Greulich, chief inspector of the Army Air Forces, of misrepresentation. It says that the Office of the Air Inspector has still taken no action looking toward the investigation and punishment of officers who attempted to deceive the committee. The army's own board of investigation under Lieutenant General William S. Knudsen finally confirmed most of the facts found by the Truman committee but sought to minimize their importance. This is a strange attitude to take toward conduct that was hurting the morale of workers and inspectors and might well have endangered the lives of our own airmen and those of our allies. The Under Secretary would do better to use less energy in talking and more in house-cleaning.

Seven Years of Franco

THE seventh anniversary of the German-Italian-Spanish uprising finds the Franco regime moving rapidly toward crisis. Placed in power by Hitler and Mussolini, Franco for two and a half years enjoyed the benefits of the strong military position of the Axis. Today, as the Axis begins to lose ground, Franco begins to slip with it. An eloquent sign of deterioration is the way his own representatives abroad talk about him. Recently an official of an American relief organization returned from London, where he had been seeking transit through Spain for several thousand European refugees. In London he asked the Duke of Alba, the Spanish ambassador, to obtain the necessary clearance from Madrid. "Is the matter urgent," the Duke asked, "or can it wait a couple of months?" The visitor admitted that the request could be temporarily delayed. "Then," replied the Duke, "let us wait. In two months the request may well have to be addressed to someone other than Franco." During the visit of Archbishop Spellman to Madrid the American churchman was frequently asked whether the Allied armies would guarantee the safety of the conservative class in case of what is called in Spain the segunda vuelta.

These revealing symptoms appeared at about the time that the Spanish monarchists addressed a message to Franco asking for a restoration of the throne. Although American newspapers carried only brief extracts from that document, every word of it is interesting. The following phrases are worth particular attention: "The end of the World War will have serious repercussions on the life of every nation. When the peace is signed, Spain must not be found still in a period of transition. Our country must begin now to build a state machinery consonant with the established traditions of Spain and adapted to the present circumstances. Only in that way can we prepare our nation to meet the brutal assaults of internal and external forces of dissolution and revolt."

The message of the Monarchists is, as anyone can see, something more than a subtle criticism of the present regime. It is a public notice of bankruptcy. Yet it would be unrealistic to conclude that the Franco dictatorship will be summarily displaced or that its growing weakness makes its adherence to the Axis no longer a matte of concern. While Monarchist plans find backing i Vatican Rome, and perhaps in Washington and Londo Franco continues to benefit from the material and diplo matic support supplied by the Allies and to render valu able service to the Axis. His weak position at home doe not, for instance, prevent him from suggesting peac when the Allies appear to be winning, or proposing limitation of aerial warfare when the industrial cente of the Reich begin to crumble under the fierce attacks o British and American bombers. It does not prevent hi from continuing to act as the main agent of the Ax in Latin America. In carrying out these important mi sions he can count on the facilities extended to him b Anglo-American policy. His agents travel everywhe on visas supplied by the democracies. The sea lanes an South American ports are open to his ships. In Sout America his priests agitate every Sunday against the allie of atheist Russia and condemn the destruction of th cathedral of Cologne.

That Franco's influence in Latin America is beginnin to cause alarm at least in liberal quarters in Washingto was indicated by the resolution introduced by Represent tive John Coffee asking that a committee be appointe to investigate Falangist activities in the Western Hem sphere. Even some officials who have ranked among th staunchest supporters of the "Christian General" hav come to the conclusion that a change of rulers in Spai would serve the cause of the United Nations in Americ They are beginning at last to realize that the influence Franco is not merely encouraging clerical reaction Latin America but is wholly enlisted on the side of th Axis. It is in this light that their recent maneuvers fo a restoration of the monarchy may be understood. Th diplomacy of expediency and balance of power that d stroyed the Spanish Republic and supported Franco's te ror is now being manipulated to place Don Juan on th throne of Spain.

The attempt is ridiculous rather than irritating. In a case it comes too late. In the year or two immediate following the end of the civil war the people of Spa might possibly have accepted a solution which wou have freed them from the yoke of Franco and th Falange. Today they see the decline of the Axis abroa and at home a regime in utter chaos. They have hea the Allied pledge that this is a war for democracy, a they are determined to accept no half-freedoms in th place of real freedom under the republic. Not even as transitional solution could a monarchy be made accep able. Kings do not ascend the throne to rule for a sing winter. The republic is the only real and lasting sol tion for Spain. Those diplomats who seek in royal plots the answer to their self-made dilemma will on add another explosive problem to the task of organizi post-war Europe.

Wallace Betrayed

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 16

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT has again run out on his friends. The letters to Wallace and Jones are a repetition of the "plague o' both your houses." In 937 this craven tactic drove from progressive ranks ne who might have been America's ablest labor leader nstead of the dark menace that he is today. In 1944 will probably cost Henry Wallace the Vice-Presidency, he New Deal its most promising leader. When the firing rew hot in the Little Steel strike, Roosevelt turned impartially on the workers who believed in him and those vho shot them down. Now, smugly even-handed, he qually rebukes the loyal and the disloyal, the lieutenant ho risked his political future for the war effort and the eutenant who sabotaged it. Justice itself could not be nore blind.

No one would gather the true state of affairs from the resident's complacent epistle of July 15. Until April 13, 942, power over the importation of strategic materials vas divided between Jones's Reconstruction Finance Cor- oration and Wallace's Board of Economic Warfare. On nat date the President issued a directive placing full ower in the BEW and instructing Jones to provide it vith the necessary funds on order. Jones has ignored and isobeyed the Presidential directive. Instead of enforcing is order, the President decides to punish both men, the ne who was carrying out instructions and the one who vas violating them. This may be the comfortable way ut, but it is not good administration.

Jones had gone to the Senate Appropriations Commit- e for an amendment by McKellar which would have estored by law the veto over material imports which vas taken from Jones by Presidential directive. Jones was hus in the position of going over his chief's head to ongress. So serious a challenge to the President's author- y called for summary action if White House instruc- ons were to be taken seriously in the future. Jones is powerful man, but the President, if he took his courage his hands, is more powerful. A fight between them night hurt Roosevelt in 1944, but Roosevelt could ask for ones's resignation as Secretary of Commerce and Federal oan Administrator, and my guess is that in a show- own the Texan would knuckle under rather than re- nquish a potent national position he might never ecover. Roosevelt chose weakly to overlook Jones's in- ubordination.

What the President, with all his power, feared to do, he Vice-President accomplished. The political reasoning that led the President to acquiesce in the flouting of his authority applied with greater force to the Vice-President. By Roosevelt standards Wallace should have quietly accepted the McKellar amendment and knuckled under to Jones. What Wallace achieved by a brave and outspoken discussion of the facts is the best answer to the defeatist strategy of the White House. When the Senate Appropriations Committee voted down the McKellar amendment, it showed that Jones could be defeated in Congress and that appeasement was not the political necessity it is represented to be in White House apologetics. Wallace was fighting Roosevelt's battle as well as his own. The blow that struck him down was not Jones's but Roosevelt's, and the President chose to run away, not in the heat of battle, but in the flush of victory. The President has never shown less courage.

From several sources, a few days before the President betrayed Wallace, I heard that Speaker Rayburn wanted the Vice-Presidential nomination in 1944 and that the Texas delegation was trying to convince the White House that the Wallace-Jones dispute was an ideal occasion "to get rid of Jones" by sacrificing Wallace. But Jones emerges from this affair with little, if any, diminution of his power and with his prestige at the Capitol enhanced. Everybody knows the President cannot be relied on to support a subordinate who becomes unpopular or suffers a defeat. Apparently he cannot be relied upon to support one who is victorious. If Wallace was let down by Roosevelt after twice defeating Jones in Congress—the Danaher amendment last December would have accomplished the same purpose for Jones as the McKellar amendment in June—if the President will not stand up in victory for the man he himself picked in 1940 to be his successor, will any lesser official in the future dare flout Jones's wishes, even when Jones himself is flouting the President's?

What rankles most in the President's action is its specious air of fairness. Both Wallace and Jones are to be punished for violating the President's instructions by engaging in an "acrimonious public debate . . . in the public press." But those instructions against intra-Administration quarreling—overlooked by the President in a whole series of cases—permitted subordinates to speak freely before Congressional committees, and Wallace was answering false allegations made in testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee. It was Jones who violated the agreement reached at the White House conference with Byrnes and Wallace by rushing into print with an attack on Wallace. It was Jones who ignored the President's wish that there be no Congressional investigation of this affair. It was Jones who arranged for an inquiry by his friend Senator George and the Senate Finance Committee and tried to stir up another inquiry in the House. Here again the innocent are punished with the guilty—ostensibly.

Actually only the innocent are punished. The BEW alone is abolished; not the RFC. Jones's friend, Leo T. Crowley, becomes head of a new Office of Economic Warfare. He does, indeed, take from the RFC those subsidiaries engaged in importing materials, but these subsidiaries remain dependent on Jones and the RFC for their funds. Byrnes is given final authority over imports in line with policies laid down by Hull. Thus a right-wing quadrumvirate—Crowley, Byrnes, Hull, and Jones—take over from Wallace and Milo Perkins In Rayburn or Byrnes the President may think he has a running mate better suited to the political climate o 1944. But he has struck a blow, through Wallace, at al that he himself has represented in the minds of the masses. Leon Henderson, Thurman Arnold, Henry Wallace—this is the roll in recent months of the mer Roosevelt has sacrificed to the right. The man who created the New Deal seems intent on destroying it before he leaves office in his flaccid retreat before the bourbons of his own party. Isn't it time for labor and the left to look around for new leadership? Newer men notably Wallace and Willkie, are providing a courageous idealism that contrasts more and more hopefully with the appeasement policies Roosevelt is steadily pursuing in both domestic and foreign policy.

The Purgers and the President

BY FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

ALL champions of the Four Freedoms and all defenders of constitutional government will rejoice at President Roosevelt's public rebuke to Congress in his press conference of July 13 for its efforts to purge three distinguished liberals from the federal service. In recent months many Washington officials have wondered, sometimes despairingly, when and how the Chief Executive would face this issue.

The legislative inquisitors were cheated of an immediate and sweeping victory by their own intra-mural and intra-psychic confusions rather than by any warning against their endeavors from the White House. They still hope to enjoy a Roman holiday next fall. For they have now created a situation in which the President is forced to take counter-measures or surrender all along the line when Congress reconvenes. His announcement that he will submit a message at that time repudiating the bill of attainder and presumably asking Congress to reconsider is the opening gun in a long-overdue executive counter-attack on legislative vindictiveness and irresponsibility.

James Lawrence Fly and Harold L. Ickes, both among the few forthright New Dealers left in the Administration, are the ultimate targets of the purgers. As usual in such cases, they are struck at not directly but through allegedly "subversive" subordinates—in this case, Goodwin B. Watson and William E. Dodd, Jr., of the Federal Communications Commission and Robert Morss Lovett of the Department of the Interior, all slated to be ousted for being premature anti-fascists and for keeping "bad company" in their early efforts to awaken America to its peril. The same House majority which sanctioned Cox' smear campaign against the FCC voted new funds t Dies and indorsed the Kerr committee's demand fo three heads. The committee's first report, incidentally which urged Congress to take an action plainly unconstitutional, opened with a eulogy of the Constitution i the style of an old-fashioned Fourth of July oration After repeatedly rejecting the House bill of attainder, majority of the Senators compromised, five days befor Congress adjourned, on the present formula, whereb the three men are to be deprived of their salaries afte November 15 unless previously appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. On November 15 moreover, the Kerr committee will resume its inquisition the scope and effect of which will be determined b what the President and Senate do. The Cox committe is preparing to carry on through the summer.

No member of Congress can take the position, despite Presidential reticence, that he was not advised i time of the unconstitutionality of the rider. Distinguishe lawyers in both chambers, most notably Sam Hobbs o Alabama, pointed this out from the beginning, wit ample citations of authorities. Said Hobbs of the fina compromise: "Multiplying the number of non-judicia trials is as absurd as trying to make three or a doze wrongs constitute a right. Congress has no more constitutional power to invade the province of the executiv authority by requiring the Chief Executive to submit appointments of certain named employees to the Senat for confirmation than it has to remove them from offic by more direct legislative action. Neither postponin he date of execution nor the grant of the possibility of nother non-judicial trial adds any color or semblance of onstitutionality to this latest proposal." But the reacionaries who control the House persisted in striking at he President in this furtive fashion and finally wore own the Senate's opposition.

Whether the President was wise in waiting until now o make known his views is debatable. He could have topped Cox by asking the Department of Justice to indict the Georgia Congressman for violation of Section 13 of the United States criminal code. In March, 1942, he evidence warranting such an indictment was submitted to the Attorney General—to no avail. "Liberal" Mr. Biddle prefers to concentrate on unsuccessful eforts to deport Bridges and denaturalize Schneiderman. And President Roosevelt, having allowed the House o commit itself to support of Cox's witch-hunt, is now hampering the hunt, with results still uncertain, by forbidding certain officials to testify. The President might lso have hampered, if not halted, the Dies-Kerr inquisition by encouraging all agency heads to follow the xample of Fly and Ickes in defending their subordinates; by preventing the Attorney General and the so-alled Interdepartmental Committee from giving aid nd comfort to Dies; by insisting that the principles of he merit system be observed by the Civil Service Commission, which has repeatedly cooperated with the Dies ommittee in seeking to dismiss liberal officials; and by pointing out earlier to the House the unconstitutionality of the measure demanded by the Appropriations Committee and by the Kerr subcommittee. The latter step might not have altered the result in the lower chamber. But it would have rallied some timid Democrats and a number of fair-minded Republicans to oppose the purgers, and it would almost certainly have prevented the Senate from yielding to House pressure.

Having allowed the House to make the issue one of egislative pride and prejudice, the President placed himelf in the position of having to choose—so his enemies hoped—between two equally painful courses: (1) that of failing to appoint Lovett, Watson, and Dodd and hereby repudiating Fly and Ickes and inviting the purgers to go to work in earnest next autumn behind deceptive façade of "clearing" some of the small fry among those accused by Dies; or (2) reappointing the men in question, thereby defying the House, possibly isking their rejection, and perhaps precipitating another unconstitutional "trial" in the Senate—which, by the way, "tried" and "cleared" Watson more than a year go.

In the final debate Senator McKellar, after persuading he Senate to reverse itself through what Senator Clark of Missouri termed "the most specious, the most ilogical, and the most outrageous argument from his mouth" ever heard on the floor, predicted that the President would take the second course, with the Senate according the accused "every fair opportunity to be justly dealt with." Representative Taber of New York, however, reiterated the Cox charges against the FCC and declared it "incredible" that the President would appoint the men or the Senate confirm them. For the Chief Executive to have impaled himself on either horn of this dilemma would have been to play into the hands of his most unscrupulous opponents, many of whom "planned it that way."

But the President has other avenues of action open to him, as he suggested in his press statement. Cox can still be indicted. The Civil Service Commission and the FBI, whose collaboration with the purgers—now being ably exposed in The Nation—is known to every agency in Washington, can be reformed. Adequate machinery can be set up to protect federal employees from intimidation and persecution. Congress can, and presumably will, be asked in September to repeal its bill of attainder as an obviously unconstitutional usurpation of executive and judicial powers. Such a request, accompanied by an opinion from the Attorney General, would command a majority in the Senate. Many Representatives of both parties might well be moved to abandon their recent course of blindly following the dictates of the reactionaries who control the Rules and Appropriations committees. And if a majority of the House refuses to reconsider, the President can support Fly and Ickes in keeping the three men in office after November 15, letting them carry the case to the courts through a suit for salaries. What the Supreme Court will say on the constitutional issue is not open to doubt.

In the long run the highest judicial tribunal will, if need be, vindicate the victims of the purgers and declare the action of Congress invalid. In the short run, the issue will be one of the President's ability to persuade the House to redeem itself and to return to American standards of fair play and loyalty to the supreme law of the land. This impending test of the President's leadership will have far-reaching effects on the Civil Service, on the war effort, and on the issues of 1944. If the forces of reaction and monopoly are not to win new victories on the home front, the Commander-in-Chief must have widespread and vocal public support on this as on other pending issues. The purgers are well intrenched and determined. The coming showdown imposes a duty to speak, to organize, and to act upon all who respect the Constitution and hope for some minimum of honor and logic on Capitol Hill. To lose this battle in the legislature, even though it be won later in the courts, will be to discredit Congress as an instrument of democracy and to open the gates at home to the very forces we are sworn to destroy abroad. The battle will not be lost if liberal voters make known their wishes to their lawmakers.

Washington Gestapo

II

I FIRST set eyes on a government investigator early in 1940. He was tall, bespectacled, humorless, and he eyed me sharply as he was directed to my desk in the office where I work as a minor government executive. I was cordial in my greeting and rather excited at the prospect of aiding in a man-hunt against some desperate criminal. I sat back in my chair expectantly as he produced notebook and pencil.

"We are investigating Bill Smith," the investigator said, "and I understand you can give us some information about him." I smiled incredulously. Bill Smith has been a friend of mine since we were boys together, and I know no one more law-abiding, honest, and virtuous. But to the FBI he had become a government employee under suspicion of "subversive connections or being linked to Communist organizations." This was not apparent to me immediately; I suspected it as I was being questioned, and the suspicion was confirmed later by the seventeen-page report on Smith which eventually reached our office, transmitted by J. Edgar Hoover, head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The investigator asked me a number of routine questions about Smith. His age? How long had I known him? His education? His marital state? Then a curiously fanatical look came into his eyes. Could I tell him why Bill Smith had grown a beard? What did he have to conceal? (He was trying to hide a receding chin about which he is inordinately self-conscious.) Why did he sometimes use an alias instead of his real name? (When we were boys and played on the sand-lot baseball team we nicknamed Bill "Hicky" after some now forgotten pitching hero, and the name has stuck.) The FBI had received a report that Smith had installed powerful radio apparatus in his home. What could I say about that? (It was perfectly true that Bill's apartment was cluttered up with loudspeakers and amplifiers. But his radio was specially designed to receive high-fidelity broadcasts from a New York radio station that broadcasts record concerts. I said I believed that his set was patterned after specifications given by B. H. Haggin in his music column in The Nation.) Did he seem to play only Russian music on his phonograph? (I have often deplored Smith's devotion to Tschaikowsky.)

"You say Smith reads The Nation?" The investigator pounced on my earlier comment. "Why, yes," I replied, "I think he has subscribed to it for years." My questioner made a note of this in his notebook. "Does he subscribe to any other subversive publications?" I said I did not regard The Nation as subversive. What made him think it was? He changed the subject quickly. Why did Smith sometimes have Communist newspaper stories on his desk? (They came in bales from the government clipping agency, which sends us everything that appears in print on the subject with which we are concerned.) Does he make a habit of frequenting Russian or foreign eating places? (I had to confess that Smith had often praised shashlik, but thought it better to suppress his preference for Russian dressing on his salad.)

The investigator seemed stung by my increasing inability to take these questions as seriously as he meant them. I asked their purpose. He said that they were to determine Smith's character and Americanism. Then he became slightly bellicose. Did I think it was good Americanism to be always agitating for unionism? Did I know that Smith was reported to have said that all government employees ought to belong to unions? Was I aware that Smith was said to have supported sending medical aid to the Spanish Communists? Hadn't Smith made radical statements about our government, such as that "men like Mayor Hague are unfit to hold office"?

Seeing that my irritation was doing Smith no good, I adopted a conciliatory manner and told the investigator at length my reasons for knowing that Smith was a good citizen. But he went away no more satisfied with my answers than I was with his questions. And without having ever seen Smith he prepared a report which indicated that Smith had Communist tendencies.

In Smith's case I was easily able to show that the charges against him were completely without substance and provided no grounds for ousting him from government service. Hundreds of other government employee have been less fortunate in the same circumstances Lacking old friends to defend them, they are out of job. today, under the undeserved stigma of disloyalty, merely because spiteful and malicious persons have maligned them in secret to government sleuths whose standards o "good character" and "loyalty" are those of Fathe Coughlin and Elizabeth Dilling. Smith is still working at his job, but the dossier on him remains in governmen files. It is available to any reactionary Congressman who wishes to attack him or the agency for which he works

My encounter with the investigator who scented subversion in a liking for Russian food and the "Pathétique" was followed by so many similar incidents that I made i business to find out to what extent my experience s typical of that of others. The chief agencies active ainst government workers, I learned, are the Civil rvice Commission and the Federal Bureau of Instigation. "This police work," as Civil Service Comssioner McMillan has called the investigation of vernment employees (1942/522),* is divided almost ually between these two agencies. The commission sumes the right to authorize the appointment of perns to the federal service or their transfer from one job another "subject to character investigation" (1943/ 55). Persons already in the service against whom comaints are made, usually by an anonymous letter or teleone call to the FBI or Civil Service or by undercover formants employed by those agencies, are investigated the FBI.

This jurisdictional line of demarcation is more aprent than real. Actually, the investigative agencies ork hand in hand with each other and the witch-huntg committees of Congress. Civil Service Commissioner rthur S. Flemming testified before the House Approiations Committee: "We tie in with the FBI. We tie with the Dies committee and with Military Intellience and Naval Intelligence. There is exchange of inrmation all around" (1943/768). At the same hearing lemming told Joe Starnes of the Dies committee: "We ave had the finest kind of cooperation from the Dies mmittee on the various investigations we have conucted" (1943/764).

Attorney General Biddle likewise hailed this cordial tente: "The Dies committee has been most cooperative. hey have given us everything that they had" (DJ1943/ 8).† The FBI's area of cooperation also takes in Miliry and Naval Intelligence, the Royal Canadian Mounted olice, and contact men on "practically every lawnforcement agency" throughout the country (DJ1943/ 89). One of these contact men, it turned out, was the otorious labor spy and chief of the Los Angeles "red quad," William F. (Red) Hynes.

Commissioner Flemming has told Congress that e spends practically all his time now on war matters, at the investigation of government employees "is a unction that I have been very much interested in," that e personally reads the reports of his investigators 1942/522, 528, 529). A passion for investigating govrnment workers developed in the commission almost mmediately after he became a member in 1939. reviously, Flemming had been associated for over four ears with David Lawrence, who has often used his olumn to attack the personnel of the New Deal.

Before Flemming took the investigation of governnent workers under his wing, the commission's Division of Investigation confined itself to the verification of references, qualifications, and other statements made by applicants for government employment. For this necessary task four or five investigators and two dozen clerks and stenographers sufficed until 1939. In December of 1941 the number of investigators had grown to 400. Soon Flemming reported to Congress that he could use at least 1,000 (1943/766-67). Since then the staff of subversion-seekers has been steadily augmented.

On several occasions Flemming has discussed the philosophy of his investigations with Congress—always enveloping the subject in the pseudo-scientific lingo dear to the hearts of personnel men. His investigators are not seeking violations of law, he has explained; they are trying to detect persons of "weak character" and prevent them from serving the government and causing "bad situations" (1942/530). "It is important," he has insisted, "to do everything we can to prevent undesirable persons from getting into the service and creating difficult situations" (Ibid.). "They may have had no association with Communists, Bunds, and so on, but if they have a weak character . . . we are eliminating that type of person . . ." (1942/529-30).

"Weak character" and "difficult situations" are ingenious euphemisms, as is proved day in and day out by the investigators' questionings and the reports they write. Having read more than fifty reports of Civil Service hearings and talked to more than one hundred investigators, I can say flatly that "weak character" is double talk for liberal or progressive views, while "difficult situation" means that a person of liberal views has obtained government employment despite the vigilance of the Civil Service.

An applicant may be eliminated from the service on the basis of information obtained not only from former employers but also from unfriendly neighbors. A man who plays his radio after neighbors are in bed, or has a crying baby or barking dog, or refuses to lend money or a lawnmower to a neighbor, does so at the possible peril of his livelihood. In one case a Scotty slipped his leash and uprooted plants in a neighbor's garden. The neighbor told an investigator that the dog's owner was obviously a man of "low moral character," and this was solemnly reported by the investigative agency to the man's employers.

That rare fellow who is the darling of his neighbors, employers, foremen, superintendents, and janitors may none the less be listed in the files of the Dies committee, which are largely based on mailing lists, subscription lists, and newspaper clippings. If so, he is subject to another blackballing procedure. The Civil Service Commission values so highly the dubious files of Martin Dies—said by Representative Stefan to contain 750,000 names (DJ1943/19, 128)—that it has maintained a full-time employee in the filing rooms of the committee merely to facilitate its use of information assembled by Dies.

We shall perhaps never know how many American citizens have been the victims of Civil Service investigative hysteria. One report to Congress, however, indicates that the number is in the tens of thousands. On December 11, 1941, Flemming told the Appropriations Committee that since June, 1940, the commission had declared "approximately 8,000 [persons]—7.5 per cent [of those investigated]—ineligible on loyalty grounds or because of connection with subversive organizations. This indicates, of course, that subversive connections are one of the primary items we take into consideration in connection with our investigations" (1943/766). It should be remembered that there is no legal definition of "subversive connections" or even of "subversion." Flemming's investigators apparently rely chiefly on their library of such texts as Elizabeth Dilling's "The Red Network," Joseph J. Mereto's "The Red Conspiracy," Lucia R. Maxwell's "The Red Juggernaut," R. M. Whitney's "The Reds in America," and Martin Dies's "The Trojan Horse in America."

The operations of the FBI against federal employees have seen a growth parallel to that of the Civil Service Commission. In January of 1942 Attorney General Biddle told Congress: "I was confirmed on September 6, 1941. One of the first things I did was to . . . [institute] a new system of examination of all alleged subversive employees in the government." Soon afterward $100,000 was made available by Congress to the FBI to finance this large-scale inquiry. A list of 1,300 government employees was obtained from the Dies committee, and according to J. Edgar Hoover, 3,700 names were immediately added to the list by the FBI (DJ1943/127). "When we hear of some particular government employee who may belong to a 'subversive' organization we add that name to this list for investigation. In other words, this list is not closed" (DJ1943/129). The source of these names was indicated by Biddle: "Of course many of these complaints are without foundation. Thus we get quite a percentage of complaints from disgruntled employees without any foundation, and many of the complaints have charged employees with belonging to certain organizations. When examined, it has developed in many instances that the employees had never heard of the organizations" (DJ1944/17).

In each year after 1941 the FBI has allocated $200,000 or more to the scrutiny of government workers' thoughts and opinions. Increasing amounts of the time of the FBI's 14,377 employees are being devoted to this purpose. The results of such a policy may be seen in the fact that in February of this year Department of Justice officials admitted that they were six to nine months behind in the investigation of fraud cases arising out of war contracts and the procurement of war materials, such as falsification of inspection records on munitions for ou fighting forces and those of our Allies (DJ1944/111)

The Department of Justice investigators receive guic ance both from the standard textbooks on subversior such as "The Red Network" by the indicted Mrs. Dilling and from a small group of officials in the departmer who have made a profession out of hunting what J. Edga Hoover used to call "ultra-advanced thinkers." Hoove himself, who personally directed the notorious Palme raids of the 1920's, has always suffered from a "radical psychosis. He is joined in the Department of Justice b such men as L. M. C. Smith, chief of the War Policie Unit of 237 employees. This unit cooperates with th FBI in the effort "to know about and prepare for an necessary action to protect the country against any illeg activity by the leftist groups in the United States, suc
as the Communist Party of the United States, the Sociali Workers Party, the Industrial Workers of the Worl and so forth" (DJ1944/178).

Dean Dickinson, also of the Department of Justic has been secretary of the Interdepartmental Committe on Investigations, composed of the Civil Service Com mission's legal adviser and representatives of old-lin Washington agencies. On June 1 of last year he got o for the use of Washington department heads a mime graphed manual which assembled in convenient form th statutes and regulations which might facilitate firin government workers. Somewhat later he prepared, an Martin Dies put in the Congressional Record, mem randa which made ex parte findings against vario organizations as being Communist or subversive. In the one of the most commonly applied criteria of "subve sion" was opposition to the Dies committee. Of o organization it was stated that it had aided the C. I.
"in staging a New Jersey . . . organizing rally." T National Negro Congress was singled out for criticis in the Dickinson memoranda for having indorsed t defense of the Scottsboro boys, Angelo Herndon, an Tom Mooney and for having "been an agitational for against lynching and all forms of so-called Negro di crimination" (my emphasis).

The anti-Negro theme of these memoranda ru through all the investigations of government worker
Washington is a Southern town, and though the Roos velt Administration has done much to alleviate discrin ination, individuals who refuse to adopt the local attitu toward Negroes invite investigation. J. Edgar Hoove who has steadfastly refused to include Negroes amon his 4,800 special agents, has a long record of hostili to Negroes. Representative Ramspeck denounced him i 1940 for playing upon the race prejudices of a con mittee of Southern Congressmen by saying that the Civ Service Commission had sent "white applicants to c ored doctors for physical examination."

Government investigators are imbued with the san ejudices; they apparently consider that the most damn-g evidence they can present against a government orker is that he has had "mixed parties" or has enter-ined Negroes at dinner. Needless to say, racial bias is ot only against Negroes. Anti-Semitism thrives in this mosphere of stupid bigotry. In one instance it had to e explained to an investigator from the deep Ku Klux lan South that membership in the Catholic church and Catholic lay organizations did not prove the existence f a Popish plot against the security of the United ates.

The quality of the work done by the FBI is unfortu-ately no higher than that of the Civil Service sleuths. is about what one might expect from detectives verted from their normal pursuit of bank robbers and hite-slavers into the misty world of opinion and in-llect. The New Yorker has reported the case of the tist seeking government employment. An FBI man ssigned to investigate him suspected that he was a Com-unist because it was reported that his painting was in e cubist style.

The classic example of what happens when the G-men rsake the underworld of crime to spy on their fellow-orkers occurred late in 1940. Representative Howard mith, who was then, as he is now, investigating the ew Deal, found in the files of the National Labor elations Board, and put in the records of his committee, letter marked "Personal and Confidential" over the gnature of J. Edgar Hoover. The letter was a report the NLRB that one of its employees was "known to ave radical tendencies leaning toward communism." To ack up this charge, Hoover reported solely that the mployee had "studied anthropology" and "visited exico City, Mexico, to observe the presidential election that country in July, 1940" (Washington News, edi-orial, November 30, 1940).

I remember that when that newspaper item appeared ew government workers thought it funny. It is hard to augh when pressure can be applied successfully to take way your livelihood because you play Tschaikowsky on our phonograph, or read The Nation, or argue against ynching, or make cubist drawings, or study anthro-ology.

"Subversive" is a vague word. But it is being used reely in Washington as a club with which to beat iberals out of town. Attorney General Biddle, who pre-ides over one of the agencies harassing government orkers, gave the game away last February when he said Congress: "What is 'subversive'? I do not know. I do ot think anyone knows definitely. . . . I have had only terrible headache" (DJ1944/21).

Biddle is not the only one.

AMERICAN INDUSTRIALISTS are in a state of unprecedented uncertainty. Their lawyers tell them one thing, their consciences tell them another, and always they are haunted by fear of the Roosevelt Big Stick. The Pacific Offensive

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE reopening of the campaign in the Southwest Pacific in early July was a relief to many who feared that the absorption of the United States in the European phase of the war would allow Japan opportunity to exploit its conquests and become unbeatable. The long delay in launching an offensive can be ascribed to several causes. There was first the preoccupation with the war in Europe, the tendency to underrate the importance of Japan. Secondly, operations in the Pacific, because of the distances involved, require more time for preparation than elsewhere. Thirdly, the quality of our strategic thinking, characterized by extreme caution and unwillingness to risk heavy casualties, has drawn out the time of preparation. When the Guadalcanal attack, supposedly a limited operation, turned into a long sanguinary struggle which at times we came very close to losing, the conservatives among our war planners insisted upon the most thorough preparation for any further step. The fighting in New Guinea and the Aleutians was mainly defensive in character.

Our slowness in opening a new campaign, while it has permitted the Japanese time to consolidate their gains, has not been an unmixed evil. Amphibious warfare demands large naval forces, a considerable quantity of merchant shipping, an adequate air force, and well-trained if comparatively small land units. With all these we are now much better supplied in the Southwest Pacific than we were a year ago. Our own bases, moreover, have been overprotected to the point where they are very nearly invulnerable. And in addition the continued aerial skirmishing has built up a decisive qualitative superiority in the air.

The three initial steps of the current campaign were taken with very little risk. Nassau Bay on the north coast of New Guinea was well covered by Allied air power. The landing of troops there near Salamaua and Lae, combined with an Australian advance from the south, was a repetition of the tactics which destroyed a small force of Japanese in the same area a year ago. Owing to the absence of enemy troops the occupation of the Trobriand and Woodlark Islands likewise represented no great feat. Only in the central Solomons was serious resistance encountered, and there the impact of surprise, the quick unloading of troops, and the adequate air and naval coverage assured success, though not without losses. It is reasonable to assume that the American forces are more adequate than they were at Guadalcanal and that the Japanese will hesitate to risk large forces at Munda in attempts at rescue which are likely to prove fruitless.

Rabaul is commonly viewed as the ultimate objectiv of the campaign. But it is 400 miles distant from th new Allied footholds. Unless, therefore, the Allies ca neutralize it by bombing they are likely to have to reduc first the intermediate bases of Gasmata, Kieta, and Buin

The difficulties of approaching Japan from the sout are made apparent by a glance at the map. The reductio of Rabaul, which would doubtless require heavy fightin and considerable time, would bring the United Nation only one step closer to victory. Truk in the Carolines 800 miles farther north, much stronger than Rabaul an beyond convenient bombing range, is the next base fro which opposition might be expected. Unfortunately Tru is not an isolated strong point but one of a group o "stationary plane carriers" within supporting distance o each other. To deal adequately with this nest of enem strongholds would require a campaign to the west base on Hawaii. And Truk itself is still more than 2,00 miles from Japan. Its loss would be a considerable on for the enemy, but many other island bases would stil guard his mainland, and we should be too far away t cut his lines of communication to his southern colonies Thus unless the Japanese risked most of their forces i an immediate showdown, many more steps would b required before a campaign along this line could pa large dividends.

One other line of approach from the south has possibilities should the Allied high command be willing t run the risk of by-passing Truk. First New Guine would have to be completely cleared of the enemy an made into an offensive base, and then the Molucca Islands and Celebes, directly west, must be recaptured

An amphibious attack might then be made on the southern islands of the Philippines, only a little more than 00 miles distant. Such a move would almost surely bring about a decisive battle, for the reestablishment of American strength in the Philippines would drive wedge between Japan and its other conquests. If the move succeeded, the recovery of the former Netherlands Indies would be well on the way. At the same time, the risks involved in penetrating so deeply into enemy waters without first reducing all nearby bases are so great that such a plan of action is not likely to be considered until our superiority in the Pacific is further increased.

The southern approach to Japan did not recommend itself to strategists prior to 1941 and was adopted principally to safeguard Australia. With so large an investment of force already in this area we have hesitated to embark on other lines of attack. Nevertheless, the southern route from the United States to Japan is not only the longest and most roundabout but through the greatest concentrations of enemy strength. Since the purpose of safeguarding Australia has already been achieved, offensives in the South Pacific should be somewhat tentative. If the enemy opposition makes our losses disproportionate to gains, we should shift our attack elsewhere.

Unfortunately, we are as yet far from the point where we can undertake a major offensive to knock Japan out of the war. In the North Pacific we have made headway in preparing Alaska as an offensive base. The completion of the Alcan Highway and the development of an oil industry in northern Canada greatly add to this region's self-sufficiency for defense or offense. The slight threat Japanese occupation of Kiska offered has been dissipated by the taking of Attu and the establishment of neighboring American air bases. But if our defenses in the Aleutians are in better shape, we have as yet shown no readiness to carry the war to the enemy in this region.

The dearth of action in the Central Pacific, the area picked before the war as the most likely scene of a decisive struggle, has been surprising. A big offensive in this region may be undertaken in the future, but if so its preparations are being well concealed.

With the liquidation of the ill-starred British and Japanese offensives in Burma and Central China, respectively, the situation in southeastern Asia has reverted to a stalemate that is unfavorable to us because it leaves Allied territory securely in Japanese possession. Until successful land offensives reopen adequate supply lines into China, the so-called short cut of the air enthusiasts, bombing of Japanese industrial centers from Chinese bases, must remain a dream. Whether Siberian bases will in the future be made available is still doubtful.

After more than a year and a half of war the position of the Allies with regard to the Japanese is still poor, though we have made great progress in turning out the tools of war and have stopped all recent attempts of the enemy to extend his gains. Of course our general position in the Far East is better because we are measurably closer to victory in Europe. Also the war of attrition has recently been in our favor. But the big offensives which are needed to defeat Japan are not yet in sight and perhaps will not be attempted until Hitler is defeated. However, the present campaign, despite its limited scope, is to be welcomed because it interrupts Japan's unhindered development of the second greatest colonial empire in the world.

A RECENT ADVERTISEMENT inserted in the New York Times by Freedom House, asking support for a campaign to promote a world organization to enforce peace, carried the notation that contributions would be deductible from income tax. The New York Daily News, without mentioning the fact that Freedom House is an educational organization, interprets it thus: "It looks to us as if some enthusiastic world-stater in the Treasury Department gave Freedom House the green light on this point."

CONVERSATION PIECE: An American business man was recently sitting in a Helsingfors restaurant, talking with a friend in English. A Finn at a nearby table called over, in Finnish, "Hey, you, stop talking English. Don't you know we're at war with England?" The American and his friend ignored him. The Finn then came over to their table with his fists clenched and said, "I told you to stop talking English!" The American quietly replied, "I'm not talking English. I'm talking American." There was a pause while it sank in, and then the Finn, completely deflated, murmured, "Oh, I'm sorry," and walked away.

IT APPEARS that the migration of Negroes to war-production centers is not an economic phenomenon. The Union News of Towson, Maryland, an anti-union, anti-New Deal paper, explains it thus: "Certain Washington politicians back of the fourth-term drive hope to pack Maryland with a large number of Negro workers, place them in good-paying jobs and comfortable government-built homes, have them declare their intentions to become Maryland citizens before November, and swing Maryland, which is doubtful, to the New Deal column."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Food rations in Holland represent a cut of 50 per cent in food value from the normal Dutch diet before the war. . . . In Czechoslovakia, home of the giant Bata shoe works, a Nazi-controlled newspaper announces, "The production of hand-made shoes has been revived, and skilled shoemakers are wanted." . . . Newspapers throughout Alsace have published the following public notice: "Philippe Schwall of Strasbourg, farmer, has been arrested for talking French. Some Alsatians seem to think that they need not pay any attention to the rule against speaking French. Those who take this attitude had better remember that the National Socialists' patience is not inexhaustible."

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Balkan Gateway

EVERYONE agrees that the Allied landings in Sicily were a marvelous accomplishment. Time will tell whether the political preparations for the first assault on Italy match General Eisenhower's splendid job. So far the course of events has nearly always followed the same design: for every step forward in the military conduct of the war there has been a step backward in the domain of political warfare. It was not encouraging that at the very hour when the invasion of Europe began, France was declared non-existent by the most powerful leader of the United Nations. And even the Roosevelt-Churchill proclamation of July 16 offering the Italians an "honorable peace" leaves plenty of room for doubt about the actual intentions of the Allies. With the precedent of North Africa in mind, we cannot assume that the most generous proposals to the Italian people will not end in some new formula of compromise arranged among the Vatican, the House of Savoy, and the American occupation authorities. More reassuring to the Italian people than offers and promises would have been the appearance in Sicily of an Italian Free Legion bearing the flag of anti-fascism. Randolfo Pacciardi, who was chosen by the great congress of Italian democrats in Montevideo to lead such a legion, was ready to go to Sicily. Allied military authorities in North Africa favored the plan. It was turned down in Washington.

Any day the Allied armies may land on the Balkan peninsula, but no one has heard of any serious attempt to enlist the Balkan peoples in a real war for democracy. In 1917 Wilson had something to offer the peoples of the Balkans. Years later it was easy to dismiss the Wilsonian program with cheap sarcasm. But no man who remembers the real sentiment of that time will deny that the Fourteen Points gave a deep hope, a vision of political freedom, to peoples striving to throw off the yoke of the Austro-Hungarian and Turkish empires. Today the Balkans find themselves in the same state of moral confusion that exists in the United Nations. They have no line, no pattern to follow. Their internal divisions have been exploited by shrewd and persistent Axis propaganda. Their governments on the spot are fascist and collaborationist. Their governments in exile, weakened by discord and reactionary ideas, are unable to keep pace with the popular movements at home.

The situation would be dark indeed were it not for the guerrilla armies. As has been true before in the history of nations, the hope of salvation is found in the masses. Recognition of the guerrillas as the soundest support the armies of liberation will receive is the prerequisite of intelligent political war in the Balkans. The United Nations must make allies of the guerrillas from the start, must consider their feelings and claims—not try to extinguish the flames by the back-fire of a reactionary counter-revolution.

I refer particularly to the Yugoslav and Greek guerrillas, who constitute a real fighting force against the Axis in the Balkans. To deal efficiently with the political problems attendant upon their existence one must first examine the political processes and trends in the countries which gave them birth.

The difficulties of Greece are simpler than those of Yugoslavia. Greece exists as a political, religious, and ethnic entity. Its main problem is the form of government to be permanently established. Though Greece is officially a monarchy, the overwhelming desire of the people is for a republic. The underground movement is organized and directed chiefly by republican Venizelists, or democrats, who know what kind of Greece they want after liberation from Italian-German slavery. By their side stand elements still more to the left. The essential character of the Greek guerrillas is expressed in the struggle against fascism. In recent months the guerrillas have become so strong in certain regions—as in Thessaly—that the occupation forces have had to withdraw.

The people of Greece, whose heroism is constantly extolled in editorials, poems, and speeches, but whose political ideas seem not to interest the leaders of the United Nations, did not feel themselves represented by the clique of reactionary and appeasing ministers who until recently constituted the Greek government in exile. At the head of that government was King George, the most unpopular of the ruling monarchs after Victor Emmanuel. His rule has never been accepted by a majority of the Greeks, or even by a large minority. Finally the forces of resistance within Greece would no longer tolerate this misrepresentation abroad. As a result of their pressure, the government in London was obliged to dissolve, and a new one was set up in Egypt, nearer the homeland. In the new Cabinet is the son of Venizelos, Colonel Sofocles Venizelos, who accepted the Ministry of Navy and Aviation.

It was the first political victory of the guerrillas. And the victory was proof that the Greek government in exile realized that when the Greek people are free they must be allowed to choose the kind of government they want. They will probably chose a republic. Their democratic past will help them to create a new democracy, without civil war. If the reactionaries of the United Nations do not interfere, Greece will certainly offer constructive support to a future Balkan confederation.

The other great force in the Balkans is formed by the Yugoslavs, or southern Slavs. It is a powerful force, but it is undermined by internal dissensions. Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes are living through one of the greatest tragedies in their history. The existence of Yugoslavia as a nation is in jeopardy.

The idea of Yugoslavia as a political entity arose in the nineteenth century, in the intellectual circles of Serbia, Croatia, and Slovenia. It was an intellectual concept, not a product of popular feeling. The masses never accepted it wholeheartedly. At first they looked upon it with indifference. Years of dictatorship made the Yugoslav government hateful to them. It brought to the masses not the freedom their leaders had promised but a regime held together by police and military, with power concentrated in the hands of a few.

One man, at least, saw the future clearly. As early as 1918 Stefan Radich, the great Croat leader, demanded a federalist democracy, including Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, and Bulgarians, which would grant equal political, social, and economic rights to all. In the election of 1919 Radich obtained 75 per cent of the Croatian votes. His popularity spread through the Balkans, but he was murdered in the Belgrade parliament in 1928. The relations between Serbs and Croats then became still more tense. In this atmosphere of passion Dr. Vlatko Machek courageously pursued the path marked out by Radich. His efforts were partially rewarded by the signing of the Serb-Croat agreement of August, 1939.

It was an important document, and a great historical gesture. By signing the pact the Croats, after an opposition of twenty years, supported Yugoslavia in its hour of peril and rejected the tempting offers of Hitler and Mussolini. Moreover, their action in that crucial hour pointed to the creation of a Balkan and Central European federation after the war.

But for the moment the agreement cannot perform miracles. The war found Yugoslavia politically disunited and morally unprepared. That explains its quick and surprising defeat. Great as was the material and technical superiority of the German armies, the military collapse of Yugoslavia was due as much to the incapacity of its general staff, which had spent its energy in building a military dictatorship over the Yugoslav people instead of preparing against an aggressor.

Once the military defeat of Yugoslavia was achieved, the Nazis proceeded to conquer the country from within, reviving and abetting old political differences among racial groups. In Croatia the majority of the people remained faithful to the leaders of the Croat Peasant Party, to Machek and his ideal of a democratic, federalist peasant state. A small minority, headed by Pavelich, Slavko Kvaternik, and Mile Budak, succeeded, with the help of Germany and Italy, in creating a so-called independent state of Croatia. They offered the crown to the Duke of Spoleto, cousin of the King of Italy, a man so passionately uninterested in Croatian affairs that he has not yet found the courage to visit his kingdom.

When the Germans attacked Russia, Himmler asked Pavelich to initiate a large-scale massacre of all Serbs living in Croatia. According to reliable reports, 300,000 people were killed by the Ustachis, a Croat fascist organization, and by the Italians and Germans. During the butchery Italians and Germans were everywhere with cameras. The photographs were published in both Zagreb and Belgrade and smuggled out of the country with the complicity of the occupation authorities. Serbian bishops wrote to the German authorities asking their intervention in stopping the mass murders. An appeal sent by Bishop Benjamin to General Dönkelmann reached the United States through diplomatic channels and was published by the Serbian extremist newspaper Srbobran, in Pittsburgh. Between the Serbs and Croats a bitter controversy arose, which was what the conquerors wanted.

The Ustachis not only killed Serbs but also Jews and nationalist Yugoslavs, and then blamed the Serbs for the killing. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, where the population is made up of Serbs, Croats, and Moslems, this fratricidal war has become so horrible that it will probably appear in history as one of the darkest pages of the war.

The situation would have become absolutely desperate had it not been for the appearance of the guerrillas. The rise of the guerrillas, known under the various names of "partisans," "green cadres," and "woodsmen," united the Serbian, Croatian, and Slovenian masses in the same movement of revolt. It started in Serbia, spread through Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, and Slovenia. It surged to the Dalmatian coast through the Dinaric Alps, to the doors of Trieste, and to the Dalmatian island which the Croat poet, Vladimir Nazor, still fighting with the guerrillas at the age of seventy-six, described as "the indestructible rock against which the ships of occupation will smash themselves to pieces."

The guerrillas would have stamped out all the Hitler intrigues and defeated the Axis armies of occupation if violent conflict had not broken out between those led by Mihailovich and the independent groups generally lumped together under the name of partisans. It was most unfortunate that at a moment of hope the government in exile made Mihailovich Minister of War.

Mihailovich accepted the view of the partisans proclaimed by Germans, Italians, Ustachis, and separatist propaganda bureaus—that they were Communists and anarchists, that their leaders, veterans of the Spanish civil war, had returned to the Balkans only to spread Communist propaganda. Mihailovich's Chetniks in Bosnia-Herzegovina, aided by the Italians, fought against the partisans. Not only did Croat Ustachis kill Serbs in that battle, but Serbian Chetniks killed anti-fascist Serbs and Croats. Mihailovich did not understand the game of his enemies. The propaganda of Hitler and Mussolini, given impetus by Dimitrije Ljotich, ideological leader of Serbian orthodox fascism, succeeded in convincing Mihailovich and his political advisers that in the struggle between fascism and communism Serbia and its people must fight the Communist menace.

It is interesting to note the division of opinion between native fascists and anti-fascists in regard to a united Yugoslavia and the future of the Balkans. All fascists—Croats, Serbs, and Slovenes—are against the creation of a democratic federal state. On the other hand, the guerrillas have resurrected the idea of a united Yugoslavia, giving it a new social content and a more progressive interpretation. Even from the lips of an enemy comes confirmation. In a dispatch to the Stampa of Turin, Alfio Russo, its Balkan correspondent, wrote that the Serb-Croat agreement of 1939, which seemed doomed after the fall of Yugoslavia, had been revived everywhere by the guerrillas.

Here in the United States only the military deeds of the guerrillas are reported. Very few people know that, just as in France and other countries where the underground is strong, the forces of resistance are engaged in a vital and continuous discussion of the fundamental questions of the future. A good number of the guerrillas feel that the best solution for the Balkans would be a federation composed of (1) Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, (2) Bulgarians, (3) Greeks, (4) Rumanians, (5) Albanians, and (6), if possible, even Turks. This federation should and could be the point of junction and cooperation between Russia and the Western democracies—Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States. It could be flanked by a Danubian federation composed of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, and Austria. Together the two federations would form a union of small agricultural and industrialized states, strong enough to stem the tide of the German Drang nach Osten and to check a complete Russification of the Balkans—although Russia would always exercise an important influence.

The guerrillas have thought and dreamed of all that. But the Yugoslav government in exile has not heeded the democratic awakening of the people.

The situation of the Yugoslav government in exile, which the conflict between Mihailovich and the partisans had already made critical, became suddenly worse when the Ban of Croatia, Ivan Subasich, sent a letter to the Allies denouncing the anti-Yugoslav policy of some elements in the Yugoslav government. The British understood the danger. They at once got in touch with Mihailovich and asked him to collaborate with the partisans. He refused. The British threatened not to send him any more help, and the Russians demanded from the Yugoslav government a clarification of Mihailovich's attitude toward the partisans. The government did nothing. The Prime Minister, Jovanovich, received the Russian note but did not communicate its contents to his colleagues; he answered directly through his military Cabinet. Some of the governments in exile make good use of the fact that they are disciplined neither by a parliament nor by public opinion.

Things could not go on that way. Before leaving for Washington in the spring, Winston Churchill sent a letter to Jovanovich calling for a real Yugoslav government with a clearly defined policy and, if necessary, for the removal of Mihailovich. Jovanovich kept the letter in his pocket for more than two weeks, but was finally obliged to show it to his colleagues. The crisis brought about the fall of the government, and a new one was installed under the presidency of Milos Trifunovich, the leader of the Radical Party.

This government follows a federalist pattern. It includes all the Serbian parties—except one representing the Serbs in Croatia—and the Croats and Slovenes. For the first time, Slovene liberals, like Professor B. Furlan, are in the Cabinet. But even though its composition is an improvement on the previous government, it is still on the whole reactionary. The best man among the Serbian members is the Foreign Minister, M. Grol. He was against appeasement; he supported the Loyalist cause during the Spanish war; he is for an understanding with Russia. The black sheep of the Cabinet is General Zivkovich, a complete reactionary, the dictator of January 6, 1929, the Primo de Rivera of Serbia.

The King, too young and surrounded by a camarilla of young ultra-nationalist officers, nevertheless made a significant statement on St. Vitus's Day. He promised that Yugoslavia would be "a real popular commonwealth of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes," and he went on to say that "the internal organization that this commonwealth will have will be decided by the real representatives of the people in the liberated fatherland." The King expressed his admiration "for all national fighters, regardless of the label under which they are fighting." He also mentioned the resistance of the guerrillas to the Germans and alluded to the partisans.

That was a promising change of tone. But action must follow. The new government has but a short time to carry out its double task: within the country to achieve unity between the partisans and Mihailovich, obliging the latter to discipline himself; and in the realm of foreign affairs to reach an agreement with Russia. Until that is done Yugoslavia will not be politically ripe for an Allied invasion; only confusion and disunity among the anti-Axis forces will meet the Allied armies.

BY ARGUS

"I SHARPLY disapprove of the sentimentality of many Germans toward foreigners," said the Gauleiter of Saxony, Herr Mutschmann, a few months ago—to be exact, on March 8. "I disapprove particularly of any sentimentality toward the foreign workers in the Reich. These people have been our enemies." In the same week the other provincial Gauleiters seem to have uttered similar warnings. And ever since then "false sentimentality" or "inappropriate sympathy" for the so-called "foreign workers" has been a constantly recurring topic in German domestic propaganda.

On April 2 the Essener Nationalzeitung gave us some concrete information about this reprehensible sentimentality. "No Pity" was the heading of an article which contained the following passage:

> One frequently hears the words "After all, they too are human beings"—for instance, when a food shop or bakery refuses to sell rationed goods to foreign workers, especially those from the east, without coupons. There are actually people who so far forget their duty as to give away some of their own coupons in their desire to seem particularly humane. Surely it is not necessary to emphasize that such "gestures" are punishable. Let there be no false pity.

The warnings and the threats of punishment, however, have apparently made no impression on persons who wish to be "particularly humane." Two months later, on June 20, the Essener Nationalzeitung came back to the theme with even greater vehemence.

> Complaints about foreign, especially eastern, workers who attract attention by their persistent begging in food shops have lately increased to a degree necessitating energetic counter-measures. All shopkeepers must be on their guard against this nuisance. Misplaced sympathy and ignorance of actual conditions unfortunately often lead them to comply with the foreigners' ridiculous requests. In addition, short-sighted kindly persons try to influence them to sell the foreigners food without coupons. . . . Anyone giving these foreigners food or food coupons, however, merely aggravates the nuisance, which has become especially annoying in shops run by women. Public begging by foreign workers can be stopped only if a deaf ear is turned to their demands. When necessary, people should telephone the police or the nearest party branch so that vigorous action may be taken.

Incidentally these exhortations afford us a glimpse of the pitiable state of the foreign workers. But the fact that some sympathy and humanity are often shown them —too often, according to the newspaper—is also worthy of mention. Considering the circumstances under which this kindness is shown—the suffering caused in the province by the heavy air raids, the sacrifices involved in gifts of food, the comparative publicity of such acts, the continuing propaganda against them coupled with threats of punishment—it is one of the more encouraging signs.

During the weeks in which the invasion of Sicily was being prepared, the German public had a perfectly clear idea of the general situation. It understood it so well that the propaganda authorities often considered it the best policy to interpret quite frankly the people's mood. A high point in frankness was reached on June 20 by the Brüsseler Zeitung, a paper officially founded for Germans in Belgium:

> It would be absurd to deny [it said] that this forty-sixth month of the war has brought heavier burdens than any one of the forty-five months that are past. Let us look the facts in the face and not attempt to sugar-coat the pill. . . . We have had no good news for some months; events and factors which could have made the war take a favorable turn have vanished into thin air. There have been setbacks and lulls. We were deeply moved by the tragic climax of the Tunisian campaign. An old strategic plan of our enemies—to attack the underbelly of the Axis from the south—seems on the verge of being accomplished. The losses which our U-boats have been inflicting on enemy shipping have slowed down. The enemy can boast that production exceeds sinkings. Finally, the enemy air force is dealing violent blows to the cities of the Ruhr, while German attacks on British targets fail to correspond to the retaliation predicted for an unspecified date. . . . Never has the enemy threatened us more seriously, and never has he seemed so well prepared to carry out his threats.
> All this has a certain physical and psychological effect on the German people. We have the impression for the first time that the initiative, which during most of this war has seemed to be exclusively ours, is as it were on furlough, and that others are trying on those seven-league boots which so far have been worn only by us. Since we Germans are better fitted by temperament to attack and storm forward than to remain on the defensive, the situation is a novel one for us.

The passage gives us an authentic picture of German thoughts about the war on the eve of Sicily. But one should not imagine that these thoughts are being translated with any energy into feeling, much less into action. They seem rather to induce weariness and paralysis. The current mood was described on June 8 by the German correspondent of the Swedish Vestmanslands Lanstidning as follows:

> In Germany there is hardly any discussion of the war or its course. The civilian population goes around completely apathetic; neither good news nor bad, neither joy nor sorrow, makes a deep impression on them any longer.

Third Growth

The little pine grove, trimmed of its ground branches,
Lets the eye through, a thread among those needles
That sew a green cloud fast to fern and rock.
In their own shade the stems, so black and small,
Are pillars of weak steel; yet nerved enough,
And tempered, to attach for soft eternity
Feathers to earth, wind music to the swell
Of soundless, of grim granite; which the drop
Of other needles, browning, will spread over,
As the grove grows, with carpet for fox feet,
With compost for silence. So the trunks,
Increasing, will be columns that hold up
A weightless, waving mountain; and no man
Will speak of stitches then. This is the time
To see it, to send vision dipping through,
And then downhill by meadows to the Hollow's
Bottom where the bone white steeple stands.
This is the century for that. Dead villages
Glisten. And the pine begins again.

MARK VAN DOREN

Anywhere Out of the World

FOUR QUARTETS. By T. S. Eliot. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

ANY work by T. S. Eliot is bound to be interesting in a complicated way. But this new work compels, in me at least, a greater complexity of impression than any other of Eliot's works. I speak thus of my own feeling because I know how differently, and with what unmixed admiration, many other readers have greeted these new poems. Yet at the tenth reading I have the same mixed feeling, and this after having tried to force in myself the delight of those who find these poems just what they should be throughout.

Two extended passages, a sestina made more difficult and extraordinary by rhyme and a miraculous exercise in the idiom and method of "The Divine Comedy," are equal, at least from the standpoint of technique, to any modern poetry. Throughout these poems there is also the invention of new rhythms, of unimagined possibilities in the movement of language, which has always marked Eliot. He is perhaps more original and inventive in rhythm than any other poet in English.

But when this is said, the weakness of other long passages is underscored. These passages are of two kinds. In one, the poet uses conventional forms in an effort to write the kind of lyric which is traditional to English poetry, and here what is to me the inadequacy comes chiefly from the choice of image and phrase: the earth as a hospital "endowed by the ruined millionaire" lacks the permanent surprise, shock, and uniqueness of—to use the used instance, permanently fresh—"April is the cruellest month." Then too the images seem made, self-imitative, forced; they have the look of the artificial, and when they are intended as emblematic or established symbols, they look merely decorative.

The other kind of unsuccessful passage is composed of blocks of long lines very close to the rhythm of prose, like much of "The Family Reunion," and deliberately direct, matter of fact, and prosaic. Nothing is more important to modern poetry than such a use of the prosaic for its poetic quality, for nothing else can give the poet the thickness, the particularity, the full actuality of modern experience, which will justify his avowed emotions and beliefs. The prosaic versification here is so much better than the same kind of thing in "The Family Reunion," partly because of a greater use of overflow, that it may mark a stage in the mastery of a new style. But in itself, it remains weak and wrong, not only in the triteness of the phrasing—"we have gone on trying," for example—but in the effort, self-consciousness, and falsity of tone. If one hears a man trying to be modest, sincere, or frank, and if one hears the trying, rather than the modesty, sincerity, or frankness as such, one has an analogy for what is wrong with these passages both as language and as emotion:

> So here I am, in the middle way, having had twenty years, > Twenty years largely wasted, the years of l'entre deux
> guerres—
> Trying to learn to use words, and every attempt
> Is a wholly new start, and a different kind of failure
> Because one has only learnt to get the better of words
> For the thing one no longer has to say or the way
> One is no longer disposed to say it.

It is not enough, in a poem, to say "I am unhappy" or "I have failed"; and especially in the poetry of direct statement the commonplace or colloquial statement must be lifted up to a new light, by one device or another, so that it is not merely itself, but something penetrated and understood as a symbol. The touchstones for this profound usage are Laforgue, Marianne Moore, William Carlos Williams—and Eliot himself, but not in these poems. And then the choice of instances in these passages, "fruit, periodicals, business letters," "even a very good dinner," marks a like relaxation of the poet's sensibility, one which suggests that he is at such times echoing the idiom he himself discovered. Too much is often made of the sheer texture of the language, when modern poetry is examined; but here it is not merely a matter of texture: the crucial instant of insight is betrayed by the language. Thus, at one important moment one gets such a weak play and shift with the meaning of a phrase as "Not fare well, But fare forward, voyagers," when in "Ash Wednesday," at a like moment, the poem rose to such a phrase as "Teach me to care, and not to care."

However, there can be no doubt about the satisfaction and the success to be found in the modified sestina, the Dantesque interview, and the organized movement of the poems. Especially the encounter with a dead master just before morning in London in war time strikes one with such astonishment and admiration that some grand rhetorical statement seems proper; so that, as Cocteau declared of the motion pictures, "At last the theater has an airplane!" one wishes to say, "At last Dante has been translated into English and into modern life." This is literally true in that Eliot has accomplished the effect of terza rima in English by alternating masculine and feminine endings without rhyme, thus evading the comparative poverty of rhyme in English and thus instructing future translators and poets. But the renovation of Dante is more than a matter of versification:

> Over the asphalt where no other sound was >   Between three districts whence the smoke arose
>   I met one walking, loitering or hurried,
> As if blown towards me like the metal leaves
>   Before the urban dawn wind unresisting.
>   And as I fixed upon the down-turned face
> That pointed scrutiny with which we challenge
>   The first-met stranger in the waning dusk
>   I caught the sudden look of some dead master. . . .

And the organized movement of the four poems makes the title of quartets denote more than the stock analogy of music with poetry. Perhaps late quartets would be still more exact, for as in those of Beethoven, the movement from part to part goes from a passage lyrical, quick, joyous, and exalted; to a passage suddenly slow, turned in upon itself by variation or repetition of the same thought, hovering over divided parts of the same symbol or idea; harsh, flat, discursive, and tortuous; and then once more quickened to certainty, difficult conviction, and the explicit declaration and direct chant of belief.

The belief, made clear by the use of phrases and doctrines in the Bhagavad-Gita, Heraclitus, and St. John of the Cross, is that the only meaningful event in history is the Incarnation, and all else—"the moment in the rose-garden," the place of one's forbears, the practice of poetry, and the whole of one's life—illusory, deceptive, empty, vain, and without meaning except in relation to the Incarnation. Seen in that light, everything still remains false and of little worth, except as a phase to be endured. All that is natural and merely human contradicts itself, love is not love, time is not time, the end of life is the beginning of life, exaltation and despair are the same thing, all desire, effort, and action must be transformed into passages of patient waiting—"waiting without hope"—to be wholly disengaged from everything in this life. Here, as in Eliot's poetry from the start, what declares itself above all is an obsessing desire to be free from "birth, copulation, and death," to be "divested of the love of created things," to be utterly out of the world. This rejection and renunciation are dominant to such an extent that the affirmation of belief seems only lyrical after-thought. The Incarnation is present for the sake of the rejection of this life, not the renunciation because of the Incarnation. And this suggests once more that Buddhism is perhaps a doctrine just as well suited as Christianity to the poet's mind; perhaps better suited, since the doctrine of reincarnation in some form of natural life becomes true and inexhaustible damnation, given Eliot's vision. To say this is to recognize that the poet's hatred and rejection of this life is something beyond any belief whatever. It must have some personal and private source, but it exists for all readers both as a profound criticism of life and as a necessary phase in the life of the spirit. If there is a phase superior to it, as most Christians, at least, must suppose (how different is the Christianity of St. Francis or Aquinas), the rejection and renunciation which Eliot celebrates is prior and not to be evaded, if one is to be in the full sense a human being. To see that this is true, one has only to remember such very different actualities as the moral disillusionment of our time and the present war; and in literature, such wholly different authors as Céline and Rilke, for "The Duino Elegies" have a close resemblance to these poems, and these poems, however different in subject matter from Céline's exhaustion of cynicism and despair, are also a journey to the end of the night, inadequate only when the journey is discussed and commended, and not endured.

Bazaine and Pétain

THE TWO MARSHALS. By Philip Guedalla. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

THE obvious has to be said: let us get it said quickly. The youngish Old Master is still his coruscating self. He can entitle his last three chapters Vidi, Vici, Vichy. He has evolved a style halfway between Oscar Wilde's and Lytton Strachey's. There is a Guedallese as there is a Carlylese; and both are acquired tastes. He is a conscientious artist, and takes tremendous pains with his baroque instrument. A superb climax like "the painted army of a painted Emperor" is reached after a patent strain. But he enjoys the effort, and so do we. We like to see a pyramid of acrobats get into place; and when they jump down with a smile, we do not grudge our applause.

Under its Churrigueresco ornamentation, the book is a solid piece of historical work. There is no particular reason why "the two Marshals" should be Bazaine and Pétain. The only link between the two is that, after the defeat of 1870, France picked Bazaine out as a scapegoat; whereas in 1939 Pétain assigned that sacrificial role to Republican France: lucus a non lucendo. The natural parallel would have been MacMahon and Pétain. But if the link between the two parts is ever so slender, each is excellent on its own merits.

Bazaine's biography is the fuller, and by far the better. It is a spirited report of a long, varied, and, except at the very last, honorable career. It gives us a good picture of the "African army" between 1830 and 1870, dashing, colorful, far closer to medieval warfare than to the modern strategy of Carnot and Napoleon. Guedalla pays tribute to the rough but efficient work that Bazaine did in Mexico: but for Appomattox and Sadowa, he might have kept the puppet Emperor indefinitely on the throne. Guedalla does not attempt to probe—who could?—the unspoken ambitions the Marshal and his young wife may have entertained. Only a romancing biographer could do that; and, for all his incredible graces, Guedalla is a very sober historian.

When it comes to the surrender of Metz, Guedalla makes it plain that Bazaine was not a "traitor" in the vulgar sense of the term. It took me a quarter of a century to discover that plain truth. I accepted Bazaine's treason as an uncontroverted fact, like the existence of William Tell, or the fight to the death of the Vengeur. I was slow to discover that history is a forest of myths and symbols; or perhaps, in the words of Napoleon, a pack of unchallenged lies.

The last third of the book, devoted to Pétain, is not so colorful. Guedalla does not yield to the temptation of rewriting Pétain's earlier career in the baleful light of Vichy. No doubt Pétain was a good soldier—with a constant tendency to defeatism; and a good citizen, for, at heart a reactionary, he loyally kept out of politics until he was seventy-five. Pétain's honor was slowly engulfed by the quicksands—of his own choosing. Because he had toyed with the idea of being a Franco, he is ending as the puppet of Gauleiter Laval. This horrible process is finely studied by Guedalla, without sentimentality, without irony, without gloating. Still, I prefer the treatment of the same tragic theme by Kerillis and by Pertinax.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Samuel Morse

THE AMERICAN LEONARDO: THE LIFE OF SAMUEL F. B. MORSE. By Carleton Mabee. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

IT IS seldom fair to hold an author accountable for the title under which his manuscript is ultimately published. In this case, however, Mr. Mabee, and Allan Nevins, who has contributed a glowing introduction to the biography, has been carried away by Morse's fancy that he was the American equivalent of Italy's Leonardo. As a consequence they have presented a curiously distorted picture of the man who is popularly supposed to have invented the telegraph. Morse was a man of considerable versatility. He was a competent painter of portraits, but when his landscapes failed to get him a commission for decorating the rotunda of the Capitol he sought other means of gaining federal patronage. Though he had less scientific knowledge and less mechanical ability than the four men who were associated with him in obtaining the patent for the first magnetic telegraph line to be strung across the eastern United States, he owned the controlling interest in their invention and received the public plaudits, the testimonial dinners, and the foreign decorations.

Morse's ventures into writing were sporadic activities tied up with his two excursions into politics, neither of which was to his credit. As a leading promoter of the Native American Party—which attracted the same kind of people in the 1830's and '40's as those that America First seduced a century later—he published under a pseudonym a widely read and dangerously inflammatory anti-Catholic pamphlet. During the Civil War he was the leader of the Diffusionists, a group of well-heeled Northerners who soon received the less equivocal designations of "peace men," "Copperheads," and "traitors."

All these facts about his hero Mr. Mabee sets forth in detail, being particularly careful in presenting the controversies about the telegraph. Where he pushes his Leonardo parallel close to absurdity and historical inaccuracy is in assuming that because Morse lived in New York City during the expansive social period with which the diaries of Philip Hone have made us familiar, this dutiful son of a stern New England Puritan actually acquired the gusto for life that was characteristic of the great men of the Renaissance. Because of his standing as a portrait painter and the sort of semi-professorship which he held at the University of New York, Morse was often invited to the same social functions which Hone and Washington Irving and Fitzgreene Halleck attended, but he never caught their spirit of high good-fellowship. By upbringing and constant association he belonged with a very different group of New Yorkers which was known disparagingly as the "Tappan crowd" and was composed of transplanted New England traders bent on forcing their native virtues and prejudices, first, on the town of their adoption, later on the whole country. Morse stuck with them in their crusades against the theater, wine-bibbing, and what they considered the indecencies and obscenities of New York. But when the national abolition of slavery became the burning issue, he broke away, because, so he declared, by antagonizing the lavish spenders in the South the "fools and fanatics of the North" would "slay the goose that lays the golden egg."

GRACE ADAMS

What of Asia?

PACIFIC CHARTER: OUR DESTINY IN ASIA. By Hallett Abend. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THE continuing European bias in American thinking on foreign affairs, despite Pearl Harbor, is a remarkable thing. It is nowhere better evidenced than in the fact that out of the scores of books already issued by the prophets and planners of the post-war world only about half a dozen take any note at all of Asia and the Pacific and only two—those by Peffer and Abend—concentrate solely on that area. While this one-eyed outlook persists we must accordingly be grateful for such an effort as Mr. Abend's to depict in simplified outline for the non-expert reader some of the vast issues that will confront us in post-war Asia, even though the picture is still left very blurred with some of the details inexact.

Mr. Abend's proposals for a Far Eastern settlement have a certain family resemblance to those in Mr. Peffer's "Basis for Peace in the Far East." Japan must of course be disarmed. "Her military caste must be utterly discredited, her entire system of education must be remade, and her form of government must be changed, even though the Atlantic Charter incautiously declares for "the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live." The discrediting of the militarists could best be assured by deposing the imperial house. What parts of the government and educational system are to be changed, by whom, and into what we are not told. Japan will be driven out of Asia and stripped of its colonies but will not be "barred from the world's markets." Manchuria, Formosa, and the Liu Chiu islands—Mr. Abend confuses them with the smaller Pescadores—should be returned to China, and it is implied, though not specifically stated, that British Hongkong and Portuguese Macao should be similarly restored. The abolition of extraterritoriality, concessions, and other special foreign privileges in China is already practically accomplished since the recent signing of the British and American treaties.

The Economic and Social Consequences of Totalitarianism

By FRANK MUNK

The effect of the Nazi domination of Europe on world economy is brilliantly analyzed in this new book by the author of "Economics of Force." He shows why the drastic economic, social and political changes that have been wrought have made impossible any return to pre-war conditions. THE MACMILLAN CO., NEW YORK

Korea, Mr. Abend believes, must be promised eventual independence, but will not be fit for immediate self-government. It must have a period of political tutelage under an international guardianship. Philippine freedom must also be assured, but "the Filipinos will not be ready for independence politically, strategically, or economically, until at least a few years after the end of this war." Mr. Abend is severe on French rule in Indo-China, "easily the worst example of the white man's imperialism to be found in all of East Asia," and argues for an international authority in which the French and the Chinese might have an important role, despite the misguided pledges of the British and American governments to respect French sovereignty in the empire. He is vaguer about Thailand but feels that it too "will have to undergo a long period of political tutelage and guardianship."

The Indies have already been promised a post-war position of virtual equality with Holland in a wider Netherlands Commonwealth, but it remains doubtful whether this will only mean independence for the Dutch in the Indies and a favored few native leaders or whether it will transfer substantial political power to the Indonesians. Though recognizing this, Mr. Abend feels that there is no justification for booting the Dutch out and that they must be intrusted with the task of making good the promises of the Atlantic Charter. In Malaya "Great Britain will probably be left to restore stability and government as she sees fit." Burma, however, will be another case for international guardianship for a period, with China and the United States, besides Britain, assuming major responsibilities.

One wishes that Mr. Abend had contented himself with East and Southeast Asia and devoted himself to a more penetrating analysis of the heart-breaking internal difficulties of those areas. He continues, however, with muddled and inadequate chapters on India, Australia, and New Zealand, before coming to the problem of the smaller Pacific Islands (which he erroneously populates in the Southwest with "Malays," presumably meaning Melanesians). The Japanese-mandated islands, he feels, should belong to the United States or at least to a strong international authority; the chain of islands stretching south from Hawaii to Australia should also come under some type of international control for purposes of air traffic. He properly criticizes American unwillingness to grant landing rights at Hawaii to Australian air lines.

Having thus disposed of the Pacific and the Far East in 228 pages, Mr. Abend apparently felt obliged to throw in two extraneous anecdotal chapters on Matsuoka and Konoye, both of whom used him to convey impossible political offers to Roosevelt and Chiang Kai-shek. The Matsuoka scheme, transmitted through Abend and the New York Times to Washington, was the simple proposal to have Japan and the United States purchase all of eastern Siberia for thirty to fifty billion yen! Mr. Abend thinks President Roosevelt "chose to reply through official channels."

Aside from a number of minor errors of fact, the book suffers from a wholly inadequate attention to the perpetual and desperate problem of Asiatic poverty and economic backwardness. It is ironical that Mr. Abend, who a few years ago was writing luridly of chaos and corruption in a then relatively prosperous and peaceful China, should now fail to give sufficient consideration to the ominous economic breakdown in Free China today. Equally unfortunate is the failure to discuss the international machinery which will be needed for preserving peace and security in this redesigned Asia, or to consider the presumable role of the Soviet Union. These defects greatly weaken a book which, despite its over-simplifications, would otherwise serve as a good popular guide to an understanding of the destinies of that other half of humanity.

Fiction in Review

ANYONE who looks for another "Rebecca" in Daphne du Maurier's "Hungry Hill" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.75) will be sorely disappointed; in her new novel Miss du Maurier attempts something much more ambitious and something at which she is much less successful. Unmistakably set in Ireland though for some reason the locale is never named, "Hungry Hill" is a long, diligent, and boring narrative of a hundred years in the life of an Irish mine-owning family whose chief claim to notice, it seems to me, is its proclivity to die young and drink too much; disappointingly it turns out that the title refers only to the copper mine from which the Brodricks took their fortune. Quite until the Epilogue of the novel I was at a loss to understand what motivated Miss du Maurier to write it, but this last section, dated 1920 and concerning itself in an epiloguish way with the fate of the last Brodrick at the hands of his own rebellious countrymen, indicates that she intended her book to be a historical diagnosis, by means of one family, of what is wrong with the whole of past and present Ireland. And evidently what is wrong with Ireland is twofold but simple: the Irish resent any outside interference—the Epilogue makes much of the "Ourselves Alone" slogan of the rebels—at the same time that they are too indolent and superstitious and unreliable to do anything for themselves. Thus in Miss du Maurier's account the few sturdy souls like Copper John Brodrick who were industrious and enterprising had constantly to battle against their compatriots, and even their own descendants were too weak and indolent to carry on the family burden of responsibility. One wonders whether "Hungry Hill" implies, then, that what Ireland needs today is the ruthlessness of the Brodrick ancestors to force order and prosperity on the Irish people in spite of themselves.

But surely this is not a novel of a quality to provoke one either to agreement or disagreement with its political implications. The only significant thing about "Hungry Hill," in my opinion, is that it has so quickly become one of the country's leading best-sellers. Of course it may be that Miss du Maurier is only disappointing her vast "Rebecca" audience, and yet the equal popularity of another generations novel, Marcia Davenport's "Valley of Decision," which had no such predecessor, suggests that the secret of the large sale of "Hungry Hill" possibly lies in the fact that it covers so much time and kills off one generation after another, reminding one of death and the transitoriness of things—a contemporary substitute for the old tragic catharsis. At any rate, I strongly suspect that at least among women a novel of this sort is read in the utmost seriousness if only because it is sufficiently time-consuming to justify the time wasted on it, and sufficiently dreary to be respectable and support the sad lesson of the American schoolroom—namely, that for a novel to be elevating it must be dull.

If I was mystified to understand why Miss du Maurier wrote "Hungry Hill" and why it is being read, I am still more mystified to understand why in these days of paper rationing a novel as large, foolish, and inept as Carleton Beals's "Dawn over the Amazon" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $3) should be worth publishing. Of course, it is about Latin America, and anything about Latin America is presumed to promote hemispheric solidarity. I may be in a minority in feeling that a trivial adventure-and-intrigue story set in South America in 1950, at the start of a new world war, is scarcely invigorating propaganda in 1943—whatever the inspiring visions of air-conditioned cities in the jungle and whatever the final triumphs of something called the American League for Liberty and Democracy. But I should report, I suppose, that Mr. Beals was thinking of art, not of politics, when he wrote "Dawn over the Amazon": according to an author's note, the political events "have been selected merely as a peg on which to hang my story; they enable me to show human beings caught in the web of tragic happenings which leave no man's life untouched." I should add, however, that if Mr. Beals's Gabrielles and Marcelas are indeed human beings and the events of their lives have anything to do with a web of tragedy, then there is a closer connection than I ever suspected between Grade B spy heroines and Sophocles.

HORSES may send their children to "For Whom the Bell Tolls" without fear. That offensive word "stallion" (not to be confused with Joseph Stallion) which appeared in Mr. Hemingway's novel and even in Dudley Nichols's original script has been changed, in the finished production, to read "blazed face."

Human beings should proceed more cautiously; else they are liable to be misinformed. When f-sc-sts are actually mentioned, the one time they are, the context makes it clear that they are just Italians who, in company with German Nazis and those dirty Russian Communists, are bullyragging each other and poor little Spain, which wants only peace and quiet. In the same speech, if you are not careful, you may easily get the impression that Gary Cooper is simply fighting for the Republican Party in a place where the New Deal has got particularly out of hand. The next speech, which suggests that not all Americans have Mr. Cooper's disinterested historical foresight, appears in the Nichols script but not on the screen. There is, on the other hand, General Golz's joke about how full of accents Spain is these days, which I suppose can be regarded as a small triumph by screen workers defeated enough to seek their victories through microscopes. There is a faint hint that Gary Cooper (strictly in character) favors Russian cigarettes; I suppose if it were any more specific the run on Novotnys would be excelled only by the Norway-rat stampede of the millions to fling themselves at Earl Browder's feet. Miss Bergman is allowed to use the International Brigade's Salud once when Mr. Cooper says g'by, but when Mr. Cooper is saving a comrade from capture by shooting him through the head, neither of them can bear to say more than adios, though the script read differently. A line of Mr. Nichols's invention, "I come from Stalin," as it is excitingly delivered by Konstantin Shayne in the best use of a bit in years, may cheer some excitable sectors; I thought it highly ambiguous and, except as a piece of acting, unimportant. Mr. Nichols's original script is fairly riddled with the word fascist. The release script and the production prefer the word nationalist. I thought I once caught the word phalangist, but it may have been fuh land sakes.

Paramount, in other words, has crashed through. It has covered itself, too, against any pink nigglers who might bring the accusation of dodging political issues. The speech in which Mr. Cooper mentions fascists and the grand old party so misleadingly does at least—and with abominably clumsy hindsight—go on to say that Spain, as the old phrase went, is a proving-ground, a dress rehearsal for a greater war. But even this has no more organic connection with the film as a whole than a Gideon Bible has with a hotel bedroom.

There is, on the other hand, Ingrid Bergman. Miss Bergman not only bears a startling resemblance to an imaginable human being; she really knows how to act, in a blend of poetic grace with quiet realism which almost never appears in American pictures. Hemingway's conception of Maria is partly adolescent I think, and for a while her understanding of the role seems still more so. She seems never to have dreamed that a young girl who has seen death and suffered gang rape cannot in all reason bounce into her role looking like a Palmolive ad. But in many moments of the early love stuff—in flashes of shy candor and in the pleasures of playing femme esclave—she does very pretty things, and later on she does some very powerful ones. Her confession of the rape is an exquisitely managed tearjerker. Her final scene of farewell is shattering to watch. Not that it's perfect. But its sources and intention are so right, and so astonishingly out of key with the rest of the production. She seems really to have studied what a young woman might feel and look like in such a situation (not a moving picture)—half-nauseated and nine-tenths insane with grief, forced haste, and utter panic. Semi-achieved though it is, it is devastating and wonderful to see.

A lot of other actors ought to be mentioned if there were space. Katina Paxinou's Pilar is sometimes stagy, but she does have style and grandeur. Akim Tamiroff's Pablo would have been a great performance, I believe, if only it had had the chance. The best of Vladimir Sokoloff's Anselmo has real sweetness, as against the stock-company naive cuteness to which the production reduces his conscience over killing. Frank Puglia's Captain Gomez and Fortunio Bonanova's Fernando are solid and very likable, and a young Cuban named Lilo Yarson gives a gentle, fine performance as Joaquin. Gary Cooper is self-effacing and generally a little faint, like the character he plays, but the faintness has its moments of paying off, and his general support of Miss Bergman is nearly as good as the law will allow.

That is more than can be said of the coarse-grained general tone of the show. Mikhail Rasumny, who might have made a good nature symbol of the amoral gipsy, is reduced to a D. W. Griffith comic with overtones of a fine-arts survey course. Joseph Calleia's El Sordo, by no likely fault of his, is just a blend of Wallace Beery and Tully Marshall; and the famous stand on the hill, which needs mathematical cold-processing, is nearly illegible. Hemingway perhaps crowded in more grand-scale characters than he could handle, but at least they had the benefit of the whole of his great talent and intention; here, though they talk forever, they are just a mush with mica flashing on it, half-developed, nervously tossed aside, incoherent. One single shot of the desperate love and hopeful intuition which prompts Agostino to strike his leader could have given that scene intact terror, even greatness, as a tragic image of appeasement; as it is, it is like a fine dog running on three legs. The suspensive intercutting of the long last night, sedulous as it is in its derivation from "Intolerance," where that was invented, only increases my reverence for the old picture; the new has all the suspense of a clothesline swaybacked with wetwash. The suspense at the bridge as dynamite is laid is boldly protracted to the point of ridicule. I sympathized with the boldness and was had by the suspense but could not help realizing that, properly conceived and cut, it could have been ten times as exciting in half the footage. The rhythm of this film, in fact, is the most defective I have ever seen in a superproduction.

The Technicolor is even unluckier. It is as good as the best experts, at this stage, can make it: which still means the rankest kind of magazine-illustration and postcard art. Color is very nice for costume pieces and musical comedies, and has a great aesthetic future in films, but it still gets fatally in the way of any serious imitation of reality.

Of all the rumbling rumors and denials of political interference on the part of the Franco government, the Catholic church, and the State Department, it has been possible chiefly to find only the clogged-drain smell which the picture bears out. Franco's ambassador tried to get the State Department to suppress it and was refused. The San Francisco consul, Francisco Amat, saw the script and objected to everything you might expect him to, and was reputedly disregarded. Adolph Zukor says, "It is a great picture, without political significance. We are not for or against anybody." Other Paramount executives have delivered lines almost as distinguished. On the question whether the opening was delayed from March to July because Robert Jordan—pardon me, Murphy—had work to do in Spain, the State Department declines comment. There are people in Washington, however, who are not eager to tie their names to it, who say that the whole affair is "too hot to talk about." Why, is any man's guess. And how this production could possibly have offended anyone politically, except a few million powerless characters who retain some vestige of moral nerve, is beyond any guessing.

Mr. Hemingway's sleeping bag, by the way, is so discreetly used that you can never at any moment be sure who is in or out nuendo.

JAMES AGEE

AT MONTEUX'S second broadcast concert with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Artur Schnabel was the soloist in Schumann's Piano Concerto; and having heard him play one of Schumann's sets of piano pieces superbly a few years ago I went to this concert with anticipation, only to be surprised and disappointed by playing that was heavy and labored much of the time—though there were of course phrases turned out with the marvelous inflection which Schnabel is capable of.

I heard only the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, which was better conceived by Monteux and played with more precision and better tone by the orchestra than the works of the preceding concert. As for this first concert, in justice to Monteux—who, though not a great musician, is a technically expert conductor—I will elaborate my recent statement that with additional rehearsal he might have achieved the beauty of sonority and finish that was lacking. My guest and I had reached this conclusion at the concert; but a few days later he wrote that he had discovered Monteux had had exactly 1¼ hours of rehearsal—this for almost 1½ hours of performance. This led me to write to him asking the source of his information, and to the New York Philharmonic asking how much rehearsal time Monteux had had. The answer from the Philharmonic denied that he had had only 1¼ hours; but it did not tell me how much time he had had. What it did was to say that conductors were being given "the usual rehearsal of 2½ hours," and as much as four hours when necessary: for Bruno Walter, merely repeating works he had conducted during the winter, 2½ hours were enough; for a conductor new to the orchestra as much as four hours was allowed. This implied, without actually saying so, that Monteux had had anywhere from 2½ to four hours; and a couple of weeks later my guest answered, naming a person seemingly unimpeachable as a spokesman for Monteux as the one who had told him Monteux had had exactly one rehearsal of exactly 1¼ hours.

Put aside the conflict in statements for the moment; and consider only the Philharmonic's statement. It is true that the length of "the usual rehearsal" is 2½ hours; but the usual number of such rehearsals with which a Philharmonic conductor prepares his Thursday evening program is four—making the rehearsal time ten hours. True, his program is from twenty to thirty minutes longer; but even if you deduct for that you don't get four hours. If Toscanini conducting his own N. B. C. Symphony gets at least six hours of rehearsal for a broadcast of an hour, Monteux should get that much for a program of almost an hour and a half with an orchestra that he is conducting for the first time.

As for the conflict in statements, let it constitute my answer to those who have wondered that I haven't established the right and wrong of controversies like the one between ASCAP and the broadcasting chains, or between Mr. Petrillo and the record companies. If I get conflicting statements on a simple matter like the amount of time Monteux had for rehearsal of a concert, what hope have I—even if I devote my time to nothing else—of getting the mere facts of those tangled controversies out of the people involved in them?

For one thing I would have to get them from people in and about the broadcasting and record companies; and experience has taught me that the broadcasting and record company mind and my own are mutually baffling. Perhaps I should say the business mind; but that wouldn't be correct. The purpose of business being, as I understand fully, to make money, there is the business mind which makes its money by selling a useful and good product like bicarbonate of soda or a new discovery like the sulfa compounds; and I understand that. Then there is the business mind which makes its money by selling something worthless like Prudence Powderfeather's Mystic Elixir; and I understand that. But there is also the business mind which thinks that the fact that it sells hundreds of thousands of bottles of the Mystic Elixir makes the Elixir a good product, its manufacture a noble act of public benefaction, and any attack on it an outrage, contending that an expert who conducts a health and medicine column should write about the Elixir from the point of view of the hundreds of thousands of women who find it helpful, not from the point of view of one expert who finds it to be three parts mud and one part colored water. And that mind I find baffling.

So with records. There is the English record company mind which makes money with products as good as the English recordings of Furtwängler and Beecham and the pre-war English pressings of these recordings; and I understand that. Then there is the mind of one American record company executive—the only one of his kind that I have encountered—who is willing to make money with bad recordings, bad pressings, bad needles if people are willing to buy them; and I understand that. But there is the mind of some other executives of record companies which produce good and bad, and offer both equally as the best—who, when they have sold large quantities of a bad recording or of bad pressings to people without the ears and the machines to know what they were buying, think that this makes the records good, their manufacture an act worthy of praise, and adverse criticism a manifestation of a viciously ignoble nature, contending that an expert who conducts a record column should write about the records from the point of view of the hundreds of thousands of people with defective ears and defective machines who find them satisfactory, not from the point of view of an expert with good ears and a good machine who hears their defects. That mind I find baffling; and Beecham seems to have had trouble understanding it too.

Mr. Lippmann Demurs

Dear Sirs: In his review of my book "U. S. Foreign Policy," Mr. Albert Guérard said that "from the point of view of the realistic historian, the weakness of Lippmann's book is that he ignores Europe west of the Curzon line." I am genuinely puzzled by this statement. For the thesis of my book is that the American nations have always since their settlement been members of a historical community, comprising the peoples who live on the shores of the Atlantic Ocean. These nations include—besides the American republics, Canada, the United Kingdom, and Eire—the following states of continental Europe: France, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. All of these states constitute, I insist, a single system of security in that an aggression against any one of them will of necessity involve all of them. I call this system the Atlantic Community. The members of it in continental Europe are all of them "west of the Curzon line."

My argument is that the alliance of the Atlantic Community with Russia and with China is the necessary nucleus of a stable world order. I argue that a world order cannot be generated on the League of Nations principle of an association of more than fifty states acting by unanimous consent, and that historical experience teaches us that larger societies grow by agglomeration around a nuclear state powerful enough to provide protection and the benefit of wider intercourse. Those who take the League of Nations view frequently argue from the analogy of the American Union, which, they suppose, was formed by the voluntary consent of thirteen sovereign states. I argue in my book that this analogy is historically false in that the authors of our Constitution did not create a new union but, as they said, perfected a union which had in fact existed from the first settlement of North America under their common allegiance to the British crown.

Mr. Guérard is, I judge from his review and from a private letter, a partisan of a European union comprising all the nations west of Russia and including Britain. I am not. I should regard such a union, if it were consummated as a military federation, as wholly undesirable if, fortunately, it were not wholly unrealizable. Such a "Europe" would inevitably be a Pan-German Europe. For there is no state west of the Curzon line large enough to resist German domination. Such a Europe would at once be mortally at odds with Russia. It would alienate Britain from Russia, and it would—if the United Kingdom followed Mr. Guérard's advice and adhered to it—cause the dissolution of the British Commonwealth and the isolation of the Americas.

WALTER LIPPMANN

Washington, D. C., June 29

The Missing Chapter

Dear Sirs: It is true that the states listed by Mr. Lippmann in his letter are all "west of the Curzon line." But they do not constitute "Europe." Mr. Lippmann's scheme fails to provide for Germany, Poland, the Danube Basin, the Balkans, the Mediterranean region. Even the states he mentions would be merely the outposts or satellites of an overwhelming Anglo-American combination. Few of them would be satisfied with such a situation. I have been an American almost as long as Mr. Lippmann; but I was a European before that, and I know how Continental Europeans feel. I am afraid Mr. Lippmann does not. That is what I mean by "ignoring Europe."

Europe is a historical, cultural, economic reality, and we should not attempt to disrupt it. If it were kept divided or Balkanized, torn between the conflicting influences of Russia and Britain, you may be sure that it would be constantly under the menace of Germany, encircled and resentful. The only way of settling the German problem is to absorb Germany into the European Union. All strategic materials, resources, and activities would be under federal control. There would be European citizens of German speech, as there are at present Swiss citizens of German speech. The difference is that in Switzerland the Germans outnumber the rest, three to one; in United Europe they would be outnumbered, three to one.

Mr. Lippmann's letter is a most welcome instalment of the missing eleventh chapter. In his admirable contributions to the Herald Tribune, he has gone farther: "Let us not imagine that Europe can be resettled and restored without the full participation of France, and without the influence that France alone can exert." I wager that France's policy will follow the tradition of Aristide Briand, and seek to build a United Europe.

Why I believe that Europe does include Great Britain, but not the Soviet world, is too large a question to be discussed in a brief paragraph. I hope I shall have the opportunity of presenting my arguments at greater length.

ALBERT GUERARD

New York, July 3

Those "Broad-gauged Men"

Dear Sirs: In an article entitled The Downfall of Joseph Weiner in a June issue of The Nation, your Washington correspondent, I. F. Stone, expressed uncertainty about the meaning of Donald Nelson's phrase "broad-gauged men."

The answer may be found in Chapter XIX of "Babbitt," wherein that worthy is accused by one of his employees, whom he is about to discharge for dishonesty, of being himself dishonest and on a larger scale. Babbitt replies in defense of his actions—using his knowledge of the proposed route of a new street-car line to make huge profits in real estate for himself and the street-car officials—by declaring righteously: "There was nothing dishonest about it. The only way you can get progress is for the broad-gauged men to get things done; and they got to be rewarded"—in this instance, it would appear, with Joseph Weiner's scalp.

FSA Architecture

Dear Sirs: Considering its immediate purpose, your editorial some time ago on the Farm Security Administration was justified in referring only to economic and related achievements. But when the final score comes to be chalked up, let it not be forgotten that the Western office of the FSA is responsible for some of the best architecture which has been done in the United States in recent years—architecture, that is, considered realistically as a social function.

The Shape of Things

MUSSOLINI'S resignation means the end of the Axis. The war in Europe will go on, but it will be Hitler's war. Italy is finished. Not all the bombast about its "sacred soil" or its "given word" can conceal that fact. Italy may go through the motions of continued resistance for a while, but no one can doubt that Mussolini resigned so that the King could lead Italy out of the war.

When Hitler, at his recent meeting with Mussolini, refused to invest more divisions in the Italian campaign, the Fascist dictator could neither carry on the war successfully nor end it. The only hope for a negotiated peace or a surrender which might lead to an "honorable peace" lay in Mussolini's resignation. Whether he quit voluntarily or was forced out, he had no other choice. A dictator facing certain defeat is already a dead duck.

The resignation of Mussolini is a mighty blow to the whole system of terror he inaugurated. Its political results may be more valuable to the Allied cause than its military effect. The important thing is to capitalize on it quickly and by methods which the people will understand. Now, at the moment when the prestige of fascism is at its lowest, is the time to make the distinctions sharp and final. The House of Savoy has supported the Fascist regime for twenty-one years. It is compromised beyond redemption in the eyes of all anti-Fascist Italians. Marshal Badoglio, in spite of his occasional differences with Mussolini, served gladly in the indefensible war against Ethiopia. He is known for his wanton brutality. It was this man, the new Premier of Italy, who hurled captured Ethiopean chieftains out of bombing planes as a warning to their followers. To get rid of Mussolini and treat with Ersatz Fascists such as these would be to sacrifice the greatest political opportunity the war has yet offered.

No plea of military expediency would excuse mistakes in Italy such as were made in North Africa. We are dealing with enemies in Italy, not with uncertain allies. We are winning one military success after another. We need appease nobody. We can fix our political terms. We have already announced that under Allied military rule Fascist leaders may not hold office. The President and Mr. Churchill should now state plainly that we will have no dealings with reactionary legatees of the collapsed Fascist power. This is our great chance; we cannot afford to muff it.

THE ANTICS OF THE SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONgress, outlined by I. F. Stone elsewhere in this issue, have at least had the virtue of jolting American labor out of its long beauty nap. Taking for granted the permanence of New Deal reforms and reveling in relatively high wages, the trade unions allowed the 1940 elections to go by default. They have now had the sluggishness knocked out of them, and there are reassuring signs that they will not again be caught napping. Regional conferences of the C. I. O. at Philadelphia and Chicago have issued a "statement of political action" which calls for a united front with the A. F. of L., the Railway Brotherhoods, and unaffiliated labor organizations in behalf of candidates who have consistently demonstrated their support of the President on major policies, though it does not mention a fourth term. The conferences, presided over by Sidney Hillman, were no doubt realistic in rejecting the idea of a third party, but a flat decision on this point seems to us ill timed. By committing themselves, the powerful labor groups represented at the conferences in effect served notice a year ahead of time that they would support Roosevelt or his choice, come what may. If the rest of the labor movement follows suit, the Administration will find it strategically logical to conciliate the reactionary wing of the party, a process which has already been carried painfully far. The decision, moreover, is a slap at the American Labor Party, which has moved far in the direction of independent political action by labor. Worse still, the blow comes at a moment when the A. L. P. is fighting for its life as a free party against the inroads of the Communists, who threaten to seize control in the primaries of August 10. The party needs the vote of every enrolled member if it is to be saved from these political buccaneers, and we hope that no one will be dissuaded from going to the polls by the stand of the Philadelphia and Chicago conventions.

THE COX COMMITTEE HAS NOW REFUSED to receive in evidence twenty letters from other government agencies, including the armed services, testifying to the value of the work done for them by the broadcast intelligence service of the Federal Communications Commission. These official documents outweigh the unofficial complaints made by Rear Admiral Stanford C. Hooper, retired, who was trotted out by the committee to attack the FCC. We are glad that the President has bluntly ordered army and navy officers not to testify before this phony investigating committee, and we note with amusement Cox's threat to charge James F. Fly, chairman of the commission, with contempt. A contempt charge would have to be prosecuted by the Attorney General and if the Attorney General were asked to proceed against Fly it would raise embarrassing questions about Cox. The FCC is still waiting for Biddle to act on evidence given him more than a year ago which showed that Cox had received $2,500 from a radio station whose cause he had pleaded before the commission. If the money was received for services rendered, the Congressman is guilty of a felony. When is the Attorney General going to do something with the evidence in his possession?

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY RANK AND FILE seems to be outgrowing the Throttlebottoms who figure as party leaders in Congress and in the G. O. P.'s major city and state organizations. The Eastern regional conference of the unofficial Republican Post-War Policy Association in New York last week opened with an attack on the domestic policies of the New Deal but proceeded to a warning that many Republicans would choose those policies in 1944 in preference to "a snug isolationism." The platform adopted by this group—among them several Governors and members of Congress—is of worldwide importance. It was the Republican Party which scuttled the League of Nations after the last war. Now we find a growing demand within that same party for some new form of world organization "to assume full responsibility in maintaining world peace." The illusion of isolationism is dying in the party once dominated by it. A conference of this kind does, indeed, as the Republican New York Herald Tribune suggests, "make the life of an ostrich thoroughly uncomfortable."

TWO MILLION JEWS OUT OF EUROPE'S SIX million have already been slaughtered by the Nazis; most of the remainder seem doomed, for the rate of liquidation is being speeded up as German hopes of victory decline. This is the most colossal and atrocious crime in history, and it is a crime to which the democracies are accessories before the fact. Now the Emergency Conference to Save the Jews of Europe meeting in New York is making one more effort to arouse the sympathies of the world. It has a number of concrete proposals to make, including an approach by the United Nations to the Axis satellites. Since the governments of these countries now see the writing on the wall, there is reason to believe that they might prove amenable to pressure. Another proposal is for temporary asylum in neutral countries with an Allied guaranty of evacuation of refugees received there within six months after the end of the war. This brings up the problem of permanent havens. Many Jews could be absorbed in Palestine, but every proposal to open the gates of the (Balfour) Promised Land has met a blank refusal from the British government. It is, of course, true that an increase of Jewish immigration into Palestine might mean trouble with the Arabs. But whatever the risks, they ought not to outweigh the certainty of the loss of tens of thousands of lives which might be saved by letting down the bars. We must note, however, that the United States would be in a stronger moral position to urge this policy if it were a little more open-handed itself.

Backstairs Diplomacy

SELDOM has a reputable journalist done a shoddier day's work than the column by Ernest K. Lindley in Newsweek for July 19. The article, entitled Why De Gaulle Is Not Trusted, is noteworthy both as a masterpiece of injustice and as a glittering example of the State Department's new technique of conducting diplomacy through pet journalists.

Mr. Lindley, who has long enjoyed a privileged status with the Administration, casts his column in the form of answers to what he chooses to regard as "the accusations of the De Gaullists and their supporters in Britain and the United States." The first of these "accusations" is that "American policy toward France is formulated by a 'pro-fascist' clique in the State Department." This is a mere burlesque of the charge, never made so far as we know by De Gaullists, that the core of the State Department and Foreign Service is reactionary and generally hostile to forces anywhere in the world that promise social change. It is by now all too clear, however, that Mr. Lindley is right when he attributes our French policy to the President and Secretary Hull rather than to any group of subordinates. So much the worse.

Mr. Lindley's denial of "De Gaullist accusation number two"—that "American policy toward France runs counter to British policy, or at most has been concurred in reluctantly by the British"—contains the admission that the two governments have seen eye to eye only "for some months." That is perfectly true, since Anthony Eden's visit to Washington, to be exact. A bargain was struck on that occasion which marked the end of more than two years of wholehearted support of De Gaulle by the British, during which time our own government did everything in its considerable power to humiliate him. No one denies that Churchill himself is now hostile to De Gaulle. Indeed, Churchill now admits to authorship of a confidential memorandum which was forwarded to the State Department and which is said to charge De Gaulle with dictatorial tendencies and with having left behind him a "trail of Anglophobia." But Churchill, like our own government, appears to find De Gaulle's tremendous appeal to Frenchmen a threat to his hopes for a France which will be pliable at the peace table. Churchill, moreover, is not quite synonymous with Britain, and in fact his present attitude toward the Fighting French is throughout England among the least popular of his policies. Certainly it is going far to say, as Mr. Lindley flatly puts it, that "the British have learned from their own experience that De Gaulle is not a trustworthy ally." As recently as July 19 the London Times urged recognition of the French Committee of Liberation and severely criticized the British and American governments for making the political aspect of North African affairs "more complex and embarrassing" than the military.

From this point Mr. Lindley's analysis proceeds from the strained to the fatuous. "The most devastating answer" to the charge that "in checkreining De Gaulle" we are "meddling in the political affairs of France," he writes, "came from Mr. Roosevelt last week: 95 per cent of the French people are still under the German heel." To be sure, Lindley admits that we "are interfering in the maneuvers of a group of French politicians in North Africa," but that is all right since they "have not been chosen by the French people." Does Mr. Lindley imagine that our interference—the kind of leaders we arm, the friends and enemies we make—will have no bearing on the future of France? And does he think that American and British politicians have a greater right to interfere in the affairs of the French empire than Frenchmen have to run them?

The columnist's arrogance reaches its full stature when he examines the charge that our present position will alienate the French people. Their liberation depends on British and American arms, he writes, even though "once liberated, they may not be grateful." Therefore if they are alienated "it will be only because De Gaulle and the men around him incite French opinion against the saviors of France. The British and ourselves surely would be foolish to deliver France into the hands of an opponent, as De Gaulle's recent behavior comes near to establishing him as being." One need only think back to 1940 to recall the figure of De Gaulle fighting desperately at Abbeville, imploring the Reynaud government to carry on from Brittany, then from Africa; of De Gaulle condemned to death as a traitor, standing alone in London, inviting his stricken countrymen to rally to the cry: "Rien n'est perdu. Luttons!" Similarly one can recall our own slick arrangements with the traitors of Vichy, our miserable efforts to sustain Pétain as the "George Washington of France." Yet now it is De Gaulle who is the "opponent" and we who are the "saviors." The Frenchmen who voluntarily bore the full brunt of the assault while we slept are to be grateful to us for fighting now that our life as a nation is at stake.

There are other brassy bits in the Lindley "analysis," but they scarcely rate such extended discussion. Neither would the article in its entirety if it did not so blatantly point up the State Department's growing tendency to by-pass the usual diplomatic procedures in favor of letting its opinions leak out to select correspondents. If Secretary Hull thought it right to publicize Churchill's memorandum on De Gaulle, why didn't he do so openly? If not, how is it that so confidential a paper fell into the hands of Mr. Lindley? How is it, for that matter, that Demaree Bess, of the Saturday Evening Post, was given access to files in North Africa which no other correspondent has been privileged to inspect? As part of the same pattern, Harold Callender, Constantine Brown, and a few other Washington correspondents have recently been treating their readers to a spate of stories from "unimpeachable sources" and bits of chatter from "high Washington circles" all blackening De Gaulle's name and none of them carrying the slightest responsibility. Gossip is traditionally a staple of capital cities, but surely the Foreign Office of the greatest power on earth need not clog the backstairs.

End the Inqusition!

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

EVERYBODY knows something about the methods used in checking on federal employees. The story of the Washington Gestapo, printed last week and the week before in The Nation, was not a revelation. But it aroused more interest than anything we have published for months. It is as if people everywhere, in and out of government agencies, had been waiting for the facts to be assembled, the moral drawn, and the whole thing presented openly and without reservation. Numerous letters, of which a few are printed in this issue, have been coming into the office. One or two expressed doubt about the accuracy of the story and disapproval of the anonymity of its author. The rest—the overwhelming majority—warmly welcomed the publication of facts too long suppressed or published piecemeal when particular cases created public interest. And several writers recounted experiences of their own with FBI or Civil Service agents which parallel or complement those described by our author.

The fact is, I believe, that the methods used by the federal investigators are profoundly shocking to most Americans. They are associated in most normal minds with the operations of the secret police of European dictatorships. Americans find them hateful and want to know why we have adopted them in this democracy. It is a sense of inner division and confusion of purpose that explains the eager response to the story of the Washington Gestapo.

Before I consider the more general implications of that story, I want to reply to one or two of our correspondents. Those who question the propriety of writing or publishing anonymous articles on a subject like this probably fail to realize the point to which the inquisition has gone. In some degree I have shared that failure. I thought when the articles came in that the author should reveal his identity at least to the editors. He refused, and for a while we considered rejecting them. He said our Washington editor, I. F. Stone, knew him and that was enough. He was afraid that if two people, let alone a whole editorial board, knew who he was the fact might leak out and his job be lost. We decided to use the articles. His fears seemed to us excessive, but they were added evidence of the reign of terror he described. Mr. Stone vouched for his veracity.

In addition, we have all experienced, at first or second hand, the examinations conducted by the federal Gestapo. I have several times recorded the questions of agents who have quizzed me about actual or prospective government employees. To read them over is to discover how closely they duplicate the stories told in Washington Gestapo. On one occasion, when an editor of another liberal weekly was under investigation, I sent the Attorney General a transcript, as nearly verbatim as possible, of the astonishing conversation between myself and the young FBI agent who came to me for information. Unfortunately I kept no copy; but I remember that the agent managed to get the impression that Mr. X was a believer in "collectivism" because I said he had doubtless supported the idea of collective security before the war.

When my friend Otto Mayer protests in a letter printed on page 137 that he knows men in government agencies who "have never heard of FBI investigations in their departments" and that the article is a "damned lie," I can only say that his friends must have led remarkably sheltered lives. Perhaps they worked in the geodetic survey. I have been asked dozens of times by FBI and CS investigators whether a person under inquiry was interested in radical ideas, whether he had been sympathetic with Spain, whether he was pro-Russian. (The deadly sin of communism is seldom mentioned by name.) I have been asked what I knew about a man's private life. A year or so ago a former Nation colleague who happens to be a bitter anti-Communist was under examination. The investigator who questioned me about him wanted to know whether he had any Russian friends, whether he had ever left the United States—a matter of State Department record—since he had immigrated, whether he lived well and, if so, how he managed it on the proceeds of his writings.

Another friend of mine, an alien, in this country on a visitor's visa, was actually queried about an American official in one of the more secret war agencies. The investigator asked my friend if he had ever visited this official at his home. He said he had. The agent asked if he knew where the official got his money. My friend did not. The agent asked if he knew whether the official was a Jew. My friend had no idea. The agent pointed out that my friend must have met people at the official's house. "Were any of them Jews?" he asked. I can give my oath that this incident occurred. In all its nasty implications, I believe it equals anything presented by our anonymous author.

Last week I talked the whole situation over with four leading officials in Washington. Like our author they shall remain nameless. But it is not betraying their confidence to say that one was a Cabinet member, one the head of an important federal agency, and the other two of equal eminence. They all agreed that the inquisition was aimed at ridding the government service of as many New Dealers and other progressives as possible. One of the four thought the antagonism to Jews was equally strong. He also believed the situation would get worse; it was part of a general reaction which was increasing. One thought that any official with enough guts to fight for his subordinates could put a stop to the depredations of the investigators. One thought the President would like to step in but couldn't possibly do so before the elections. One pointed out the mitigating fact that many progressives had survived the purge. "The trouble is," he said, "that the atmosphere has become stifling. Men and women of liberal mind hate to work in most of the agencies. Still more refuse government posts in the first place. Slowly, but very perceptibly, this pressure is impoverishing the whole federal service."

But the corroboration of high government officials is hardly necessary to establish facts so generally known. What is important is to realize what they mean. What is more important still is to do something about them.

Jay Allen, lecturing on the government's foreign policy, has referred to our "national schizophrenia." The investigations by federal agents are another symptom of the same disease. We are waging a dangerous, deadly civil war. That it is a political and psychological war rather than a military one merely makes its manifestations less noisy, its casualty lists less obvious. The division in our political life slices through every department, every bureau, every agency. It even runs through individuals, and one of the individuals most profoundly afflicted is the President himself.

We must accept the fact that our federal police and other agencies of investigation are firmly planted on the reactionary side in this internal struggle. They are more afraid of liberals and progressives, of Socialists and near-Socialists, of Communists and fellow-travelers, than they are of pro-Nazis or native fascists. We must accept the fact that the present Congress, by a big majority, supports this position. We must accept the fact that most agency and department heads will continue to make appointments with one eye on the FBI and the other on Martin Dies. They know that their appropriations depend upon the favor with which they are regarded in Congress and that a record of "bad" appointments or defiance of the federal investigators may well mean the death or crippling of their offices. The life-or-death power of Congress over the whole administrative apparatus has turned many a liberal executive into a mouse.

But having set down and digested these unsavory items, we can still insist that a little courage in a few major posts could do much to weaken the regressive elements in our split personality.

Last week, in an article by Frederick L. Schuman, the Attorney General was referred to as a "liberal." The quotation marks were unfair. Mr. Biddle is a liberal, and he has the faults that too often go with the quality of liberalism. He is not a fighter. He compromises when he should be stiff. He is severe when the enemy is weak. But the implication in the second instalment of Washington Gestapo that Dies has had the full support of Biddle is, I believe, unfair. While the FBI has doubtless cooperated with the Dies committee upon occasion, it has also found the committee's noisy methods a hindrance to its own legitimate work. Nor should it be forgotten that the Attorney General gave precise figures to show how few of the federal employees charged by Dies with subversive connections were found guilty by the FBI. Biddle's fault lies in his acquiescence in equally detestable methods employed by the FBI. He has never dared to challenge the operations of the redoubtable Edgar Hoover. Rather than risk a showdown with an agency which has such tremendous prestige in Congress and the country, he allows Hoover to terrorize the people who are Biddle's natural political friends and allies. Putting the matter bluntly, Biddle has far less guts than his reactionary subordinate. And with a few exceptions, like Secretary Ickes, the same must be said of the other liberals in the government. They let the men of will, the ruthless and unscrupulous men, ride over them and their decent convictions. And so our political practices continue to war with our political faith—and democracy is divided and weakened from top to bottom.

What can be done? It is useless merely to ask Biddle to end the inquisition. He will not make a move unless he makes it under pressure. One force which might encourage him to act would be a strong demand from the heads of the various agencies and departments. But that in turn is unlikely unless the administrative personnel itself is willing to fight. A powerful union of federal employees could end the rule of both Dies and Hoover if it wanted to. Pressure from the outside would be useful too. Citizens' organizations such as the Council for Democracy and the Union for Democratic Action should fight for a new policy. Labor unions, realizing that their friends are being driven out of office, should throw their whole strength against the methods of the federal police. Widespread publicity and popular protests should be launched and a Congressional inquiry demanded as soon as Congress reconvenes. Only by action which vigorously combats the fascist tactics of our Washington Gestapo can democracy in the federal service survive. I hope our readers will help to organize such action in every part of the country.

The Cantankerous Congress

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 23

THE Key Issue. The key issue on the home front is the fight against inflation. A genuine roll-back of prices would greatly increase the President's popularity. A reduction in price at the grocery counter is something every housewife could understand, and no Congressman would dare fight. Congress recessed without enacting restrictions on a roll-back of food prices, but Byrnes and Price Administrator Prentiss Brown seem to have given behind-the-scenes pledges that they would make only limited use of their powers on this score. If such pledges were made, they ought not to be allowed to bind the President. A further rise in living costs would involve the possibility of the most dangerous kind of disintegration on the home front: spontaneous strikes, bitter class feeling, more anti-labor legislation, the destruction of morale on the assembly line and in the kitchen.

Now's the Time to Act. A series of roll-back subsidies before Congress reconvenes would change the whole political atmosphere, strengthen the President. Even in the right wing of the Democratic Party there is support for subsidies. Roll-back subsidies are "the only logical and effective way of 'holding the line' on the cost of living." They "will benefit those who cannot pay more, as well as those who can, and the cost will be relatively small." The words quoted are from a radio speech made during the past week by that Texas left-winger Jesse Jones.

Profiteers. Although industry has soaked the army and navy some fancy prices for arms and is doing very well despite excess-profits taxes, it deserves credit for its part in helping to keep down the prices of basic raw materials in this war much better than in the last. The Anti-Trust Division under Thurman Arnold scared a price reduction out of Alcoa. Leon Henderson, by sheer bluff, managed to hold down the price of steel—but the bluff wouldn't have worked if United States Steel, leader of the industry, hadn't been taking a much more cooperative attitude toward the government. Henderson also managed to hold the line against increases in the price of copper and crude oil—offering higher prices for increased production instead of a general price increase. In this respect Brown has followed in his footsteps, though under pressure from Ickes he now seems to be on the verge of surrendering to the oil industry's demand for a higher price "to encourage new production."

By contrast with the farm bloc, industry's record is patriotic and praiseworthy. The only section of industry which has vigorously and successfully fought price controls is that section which processes food. Some of the big processors are themselves growers; others are linked with banks holding farm mortgages. These are the bankers and trusts "in overalls" who supported organizations like the Associated Farmers before the war. Allied with the big farmers and cattlemen and helped by the farmers' natural weakness for inflationary sprees, the canners, packers, millers, and bakers have become a sector of industry most dangerous to the war effort. These elements of big business and the big farmers are the outstanding profiteers of World War II.

The Farm Bloc's Record. In retrospect the story of the session is a series of hairbreadth escapes from the farm bloc. The Pace bill, to include farm labor costs in determining parity, would have added three billion dollars to food costs. It passed the House but was killed in committee in the Senate. The Bankhead bill to exclude benefit payments in determining parity ceilings would have added two billion dollars to the nation's food bill. It passed both Houses but was vetoed by the President, and the veto was sustained. The President's veto message pointed out that farm prices were already 115 per cent of parity as compared with the World War I peak of 107 per cent. The farm bloc did succeed in enacting the Bankhead-Johnson bill to defer essential farm labor from military service. Under Secretary Patterson said that in Connecticut passage of this bill caused a disastrous flow of labor from munitions plants back to the farm.

The Senate passed a resolution to permit the sale of corn at $1.40 a bushel as compared with the hog-corn ratio price of $1.30 and the OPA ceiling of $1.07 a bushel. But the House Agriculture Committee voted to table this on the day before adjournment. The narrowest escape and the most dangerous was on roll-back subsidies, which were opposed both by the Farm Bureau Federation and by the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, long a stooge of the milk trust. The farm bloc succeeded in writing an anti-subsidy provision into the Commodity Credit Corporation bill but not in overriding the President's veto of that measure.

Four days after the President's veto, the Senate by a vote of thirty-six to twenty-eight approved a more stringent restriction against subsidies by Tydings of Maryland. But on the very day of adjournment the Senate voted to eliminate this ban against food roll-backs. The vote was thirty-four to thirty-three, and the Senate's action was then accepted by the House. Thus subsidies were saved by a single vote and still depend on whether the President will override the timidity of Byrnes and Brown. On net balance, the farm bloc's influence was negative rather than positive. Its greatest victory was the abolition of the Farm Security Administration.

The attack on the FSA was opened by the Byrd committee, and one of the most idiotic statements of the session was Senator Byrd's charge that the FSA was "based on the Communist form of government." Actually it seeks to widen the private ownership of property among tenants and farm workers. That, and not communism, is what the farm bloc has against it. As Lambertson of Kansas objected two years ago, the FSA "takes hired hands and makes independent farmers of them." Despite Byrd and the Farm Bureau, the Senate in June had voted sixty-six to twelve to retain the FSA. But in the House the farm bloc succeeded in having the FSA transferred to the War Food Administration, which is dominated by the big farmers and processors.

How Labor Fared. Labor's greatest interest in the session lay in the fight to roll back the price of food. In the matter of strictly labor legislation it succeeded in killing the Hobbs anti-racketeering bill in the Senate after it passed the House. Labor suffered a severe setback in the passage over the President's veto of the Connally-Smith bill and another in the passage of an amendment forbidding the National Labor Relations Board to order an election in plants where a labor contract has been in force for three months without an appeal. Though this had the backing of the A. F. of L., it will hurt all legitimate unions wherever company unions have been successfully launched. The Connally-Smith bill was passed because of the coal strike; the NLRB amendment because of the stupidity of some A. F. of L. leaders.

Social Security. Next to the fight against inflation, labor's greatest domestic concern was in plans for increased social security. In his message to Congress the President asked for security "from the cradle to the grave." On March 10 he sent the monumental report of the National Resources Planning Board to Congress and asked that its proposals for a stable and planned society be given "full consideration during this session." Congress responded by abolishing the National Resources Planning Board. Taft and Tydings led the fight against the NRPB in the Senate, the former calling its proposals "partly socialism and partly the product of a dangerous imagination." The Senate is not opposed to planning per se, though one would think so from most of the speeches. It is only opposed to planning in behalf of the underprivileged. The Senate Finance Committee hired the Brookings Institution to make a study of post-war planning. Brookings has become the leading academic mouthpiece and lobbyist of big business in the capital.

Dies. If the President had taken a hearty wallop at Dies or turned the laugh on him, the Texan's investigating committee might have been stopped this year. The success registered by Secretary Ickes in fighting for Robert Morss Lovett showed what a courageous administrator can do against Dies. There was an incipient revolt in the House that could have defeated Dies with a little Administration support. On February 3 Folger of North Carolina attacked Dies on the floor and said he had spent 90 per cent of his time and effort hunting "reds" rather than Axis agents. On February 5 the House rejected a motion by Hendricks of Florida to halt the salaries of thirty-eight government employees Dies had attacked as "radical bureaucrats." But by February 10 the revolt had died down, and the House voted 302 to 94 to continue the Dies committee for another two years. Dies's announcement after the Detroit riots that he would investigate "the coddling of races by politically minded people" indicates that he may become more dangerous than ever to the war effort. He stirred up un-American doctrines under the guise of investigating them, and he is now out to stimulate race hatred in the same manner. In this connection, it is pleasant to report that the McKellar amendment, requiring Senate confirmation of all government employees earning more than $4,500 a year, was defeated in the House after passing the Senate. Under it there would have been a Dies-style debate in the Senate every time a New Dealer came up for confirmation.

The War Against Roosevelt. When Congress met in January, Speaker Rayburn and Minority Leader Martin suggested that it be called the Victory Congress. The Cantankerous Congress would be a better name for it. It killed the NYA and the Guffey act. It cut the appropriations of OPA and OWI. Its keynote was struck by Cox of Georgia when he said, "Government by bureaucrats must be broken"; and the unfair and dirty attack made by Lambertson of Kansas on the President's sons was typical of the level on which it operated. A House committee with an ex-Coughlinite counsel stirred up anti-Semitism with its below-the-belt attacks on David Ginsburg and other Jewish lawyers in the OPA. The objective of the bi-partisan anti-New Deal coalition which dominated the session seems to have been to create a maximum of confusion. The war it waged was a war against Roosevelt.

The Record of Byrnes. Principal cloakroom politician for the White House is James E. Byrnes. Byrnes was supposed to have great influence in Congress. The New Deal has never taken a worse beating "on the Hill" than in the period since Byrnes stepped down from the Supreme Court to become the President's assistant. Byrnes is devoted and able but seems a man of mediocre mind with little conception of the larger issues on which the country can be aroused in support of the Administration.

Who's to Blame? First, you and I and the organized labor movement for not electing a better Congress in the fall of 1942. Second, the President, who has relied too much on cloakroom politicians instead of taking the complicated problems of the home front to the people and helping them to understand what the uproar's about.

Japanning the Philippines

BY CARL CROW

THE official Tokyo radio station recently broadcast on all Far Eastern beams, in a dozen languages, the report that an increasing number of Filipinos were abandoning the vulgar American custom of shaking hands. When they meet Japanese friends or acquaintances now, they bow, from the waist, just like any well-bred Japanese.

Nipponese radio commentators and editorial writers hailed this bit of news as conclusive evidence that the process of Japanning the Filipinos was well under way. The program is comprehensive and ambitious. The Japanese are not content when subjugated peoples merely accept their rule patiently and obediently. Those who sincerely accept Japanese rule must try to be like their conquerors in language, manners, and thought. Most important of all, the Filipinos must eradicate all trace of American influence.

Tokyo asserts that the Japanese regime is steadily gaining friends and supporters among the Filipinos. The Philippine government in exile says unfortunately this is true. For diametrically opposite reasons it is to the interest of each to emphasize the Japanese progress; the exiles, of course, hope to needle the United States into hurrying a campaign of reconquest.

It is hard to assess the truth. Prominent Filipinos have broadcast their praise of the New Order. The extravagance of their phrases could be interpreted either as irony or enthusiasm. Large numbers of Filipinos are working for the Japanese. If they did not, they would not eat. Only time, and reconquest, will tell how many islanders actually have switched loyalty. The pressures applied have been thorough and relentless, under a program which obviously had been worked out long in advance, down to the last detail.

The Japanese army had thoughtfully brought along its own currency—handsome steel-engraved bank notes, imitations of legitimate Philippine Commonwealth currency. Remarks by Japanese officers led to the belief that the notes had been stored in army vaults for several years. There appeared to be inexhaustible bales of these notes—certainly enough to pay for everything the army wanted. The only defect about the currency was that nowhere was there any indication as to when, how, or by whom it would be redeemed. But since it was backed by Japanese bayonets and since refusal to accept it was regarded as an insult to the Japanese army, the currency soon gained wide circulation.

All property was supposed to belong to enemy aliens, meaning Americans, British, or Chinese, unless proved otherwise, and therefore was subject to confiscation. This made rather a clean sweep. Most of the large concerns, being incorporated under Philippine law, were under the American flag. Some of the oldest trading and shipping companies were British. Chinese owned most of the retail shops. Mitsubishi and other big concerns took over some of the mines, shipping, and sugar refineries. The Japanese army took over the profitable San Miguel brewery, which included the local Coca-Cola bottling agency, and is still running it. Wealthy Filipinos with political influence or with important connections in Spain were not disturbed in possession of their estates—provided they submitted to Japanese-army "guidance."

Banks and insurance companies were seized by the army and "reorganized" before being turned over to Japanese companies. One of the first regulations provided that the insurance companies would pay no death benefits if the insured had lost his life while opposing the benevolent entry of the Japanese army. This saved the insurance companies large sums, as everyone killed was presumed to have been an enemy of Japan.

Texaco and Socony filling-station signs were painted over with the name of the Japanese company which grabbed them. The Japanese carpetbaggers improved on the clumsy methods of our own Civil War. They traveled with, not after, the army. For that matter, many of them were local residents who long before had picked out the property they wanted.

Japanese carpetbaggers who set out to exploit the country were aghast to find that Filipino workers of all classes were paid approximately twice as much as similar workers in Japan. The army solved this problem by a very simple procedure. All salaries and wages were ordered cut in half. The cut applied to all—day laborers, skilled mechanics, white-collar workers, superintendents, and executives. The salaries of high officials of the Commonwealth and of the municipality of Manila suffered still greater reductions, bringing them in line with the poorly paid officials of Japan. That was the Filipinos' first experience with the practical workings of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. They were back again where they were under Spanish rule, the gains of forty years wiped out. Under the reduced wage scale the Filipino standards of living, which were the highest in the Orient, dropped as low as those of Japan itself.

Then came taxes, like a second visitation of locusts. All the old taxes were retained and new ones added.

The most onerous is a sales tax starting with 20 per cent on necessities and rising to 60 per cent on a graduated scale covering different classifications of luxuries. The garrulous Tokyo radio said that the Filipinos had been guilty of extravagant living, indulging themselves in such useless luxuries as ice-cream cones and jazz phonograph records. They were not frugal and austere like the Japanese. The army sent out lecturers to chide the Filipinos about their way of life, and Tagalog newspapers published illustrated articles showing how the Japanese lived. There can be no doubt that the Filipinos have given up luxurious living. They are frugal now to the point of hunger.

In Japan when farmers are told to plant rice they plant rice; when told to raise silk worms they raise silk worms. It was in this way that the army controlled the economy of the country and built up its huge war machine. The army attempted the same regimentation of the farmers of the Philippines. Strict orders were issued that large acreages of cane be plowed up and the land planted to cotton. Several thousand agricultural experts clothed with some police authority were sent from Japan to see that this program was carried out. The fact that not one farmer in ten thousand knew anything about growing cotton did not deter the army economists. They need cotton desperately. Filipinos, like all other farmers, are stubbornly conservative, and did not take kindly to the new program. They were threatened and cajoled, but fewer than fifteen thousand have planted cotton. The most they can grow would keep the mills of Japan busy for only a few hours, would provide uniforms for only a few divisions.

While decreased pay and increased taxes have reduced the Filipinos to poverty and hunger, a third development has brought millions of them to even greater depths. This is the inability of the Japanese to market the export crops, principally sugar and cocoanut oil. The markets of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere cannot absorb these products, which we formerly bought. Even if the markets could absorb them, the Japanese would not be able to spare the ships to carry the cargoes. One Filipino in every four is directly dependent on these crops, which are now valueless.

The Japanese are unable to market Philippine products and are equally unable to bring in the manufactured articles that are desperately needed. They also find great difficulty in providing an adequate supply of rice, a food crop in which the Philippines are deficient. The manufactured goods most needed are those Japan is least able to supply—cotton textiles of all description. There are a few thousand spinning-wheels and looms in the Philippines, but these can do little more than supply clothing for the families which own them. Filipinos have always depended on imported cotton cloth, buying each year more than $10,000,000 worth. There have been no importations since the Japanese occupation, for Japan has not enough cotton goods even for its own people. When the Japanese marched in, the army requisitioned all cotton goods that could be put to military use. Filipinos are in rags.

One of the first orders issued outlawed the use of any language save Tagalog, which some 4,000,000 of the 17,000,000 inhabitants of the islands speak, and Japanese. English, the language spoken by all educated Filipinos and the basis of the whole educational system, was outlawed. Spanish, the second most important language, was also prohibited, but the Spanish Falangists pulled diplomatic strings in Madrid, and that ban was lifted.

The outward appearance of Manila streets changed rapidly. The fine old churches, convents, and monasteries of the walled city remained as evidence that this was once a proud possession of colonial Spain. The modern buildings and wharves and broad thoroughfares testified to the progress that had been made under the American flag. But a rash of blatant official and commercial signs in Japanese characters broke out everywhere. If a shopkeeper was not quick about changing, Japanese hoodlums destroyed the old sign while police looked on. Street names were changed, especially those having any American significance. The new names were Japanese, not Filipino. Filipinos didn't have the faintest idea of what the new signs meant. But it had the effect of making Manila look like a Japanese city, which was what the conquerors desired.

Huge stores of official stationery in offices of the Commonwealth and the municipality of Manila were hastily overprinted, all English text being obliterated. Postage stamps were surcharged with Japanese characters. New motor-car license plates were issued with numbers in Japanese symbols. Traffic signs appeared in the same language, and ignorance of their meaning was no excuse in the eyes of the military police. These busy officials looked with suspicion on anyone who spoke English and often treated him roughly. Since most of the police did not know the difference between German and English, some of their Nazi colleagues got shoved around.

The military police inspected shops to see that all signs and prices were in the official languages. The Japanese carpetbaggers, who rapidly replaced the Chinese in small retail shops, could speak no language but their own, and shoppers had to speak it or they would not be served. This presented no great difficulties. Colloquial Japanese is one of the easiest of languages. Anyone can learn enough of it in a few days to barter with shopkeepers.

If claims made by the Tokyo radio are true, and they probably are, the police speak only Japanese, and no other language is used in shops. It is amusing to note, however, that most of the broadcasts made by the Japanese to the Filipinos are in English, the outlaw tongue. They are compelled to bootleg their own propaganda.

The order outlawing English scrapped the fine educational system that had been built up by the joint efforts of Americans and Filipinos over a period of more than forty years. More than a million textbooks in 12,000 public schools had to be discarded. As there were no Japanese teachers to staff the schools, all were closed. Since then, 600 have been reopened, 5 per cent of the original number. They provide nothing but a two-year course in the Japanese language, though other courses have been promised. Textbooks were imported from Japan—books in a language that not one Filipino in a hundred thousand could read. The Tokyo newspapers said that some of the most popular old texts would be translated into Japanese. Revisions would be made, pointing out the evils of democracy, the cruelty and injustice of American rule in the Philippines, and the righteousness of Japan's cause.

It has become obvious that the Japanese army has scrapped the educational system without providing anything to replace it, that it does not, in fact, want to replace it. The Japanese have deliberately blown out the light, planning a period of darkness and ignorance during which American influence will be obliterated.

The Japanese were very solicitous about "protecting" the Roman Catholic church—from what was not made clear. On the first Sunday after landing in Manila the Japanese soldiers marched to Mass in squad formations, filling all the churches and chapels of that Catholic city. Armed guards of honor were placed outside each door. Filipinos rubbed their eyes. There hadn't been so many people at Mass since the Eucharistic Congress was held in Manila, attracting Catholics from all over the world.

Since only about one Japanese in two thousand is a Catholic, the law of averages would lead one to expect to find fewer than ten Catholics to a division. But in Manila it appeared that almost every other soldier attended Mass and made the sign of the cross at every convenient opportunity. Their behavior was eminently correct—so meticulously correct that it seemed, like their battle tactics, the result of intensive training.

The soldiers were veterans of the war in China. For years they had looted and burned Christian missions and churches, Catholic and Protestant alike. Included in the forces were a few divisions which had taken part in the rape of Nanking. It was, of course, a miracle of grace which changed the character of these bestial soldiers so quickly.

The Tokyo radio gave full credit for this benevolence toward the church to that curious organization the "Religious Department" of the Japanese army. This is a selected group of experts in various religions. Within its ranks are men who could actually impersonate the priests of many religions. The purpose of the department is to exploit all religions; to use them wherever possible as a means of furthering Japan's dream of world empire. Propaganda agencies lost no time in telling Catholics all over the world about the way the Japanese soldiers had filled Manila churches. Photographs were sent to newspapers in Latin America as proof of the very friendly relations existing between the Japanese army and the Catholic church.

The most spectacular stunt arranged by the busy Religious Department was a "pilgrimage" of Catholic priests and nuns from Japan to the Philippines. That was what it was called, though it did not resemble any other pilgrimage the Filipinos had ever seen. The nuns received as much publicity as a group of traveling show girls and were seen everywhere.

While the Religious Department cajoles the Catholic church and experiments with the strategy of infiltration, high officials in Tokyo pull no punches and mince no words when explaining their attitude toward religion. Referring to the Christians and Mohammedans, Premier Tojo said: "We must respect their religions and guide them properly. However, there is one problem. If religion is used to manifest enmity against us, then we must suppress it. Let there be no misunderstanding about that."

As the Japanese have shown on numerous occasions, "guidance" means control. As they have also shown, failure to support them in their plans for conquest is regarded as an expression of enmity. In other words, religion must conform to Japanese ideas.

Deaths at the hands of the Japanese armed forces continued for some time after the fall of Bataan and the surrender of Corregidor. When a civilian failed to bow to a Japanese soldier, the affronted soldier might punish the insult as he pleased. Often he shot to kill. A great many prominent Chinese and Filipinos were murdered for this and other reasons. There were no trials. More than twenty of the most prominent members of the local Chinese community were killed for no reason apparently but that they had supported the Chinese government. Among them was Albino Cy Sip, one of the most highly respected residents of the Islands. A Filipino victim of the Japanese reign of terror was José Abad Santos, a justice of the Supreme Court of the Philippines. Some of the victims were humanely killed by shooting. Many Filipinos, however, were strung up by the feet until they died. This barbarity was perpetrated in the most crowded sections of Manila. For some curious reason, no Americans were treated in this way.

There are no bright spots to relieve the dark picture of the life of the Filipinos under the boot heel of Japan. Trade is stagnant, the shelves of the shops are becoming bare. The small steamers and motor launches which formerly brought life to the rivers of the country are gone—requisitioned by the army. Small sailing boats handle the trickle of river trade which persists. Many thousands of farmers have abandoned their homes and taken to the hills to join partisan bands. There are skirmishes with the Japanese almost every day.

Filipinos are glad to give up the custom of shaking hands. It relieves them of the necessity for a false gesture of friendship toward their oppressors. The low bow, in the Japanese style, has no traditional significance. But it has become an ironic symbol of deep and abiding hatred.

Let's Look at Labor

IV. HOW TO CHOKE UNIONS

BY VICTOR RIESEL

WILLIAM GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, who has never been known as a swashbuckler, has ordered the state federations and city bodies in Texas, Arkansas, South Dakota, Idaho, Kansas, and Colorado to challenge the anti-labor laws recently passed by their legislatures and to drag the state officials through all the courts of the country if necessary to disprove the validity of those laws. The usually cautious Mr. Green was moved to action by an extraordinarily dangerous threat to labor organization.

The Christian American Association, some of whose professional promoters have long dealt in anti-Semitism, anti-Negro activity, and the organization of anti-union lobbies, has sponsored anti-labor laws in forty-four states and has succeeded in having them passed in nine. All these laws show signs of common authorship, and the similarity of the lobbying tactics that put them over indicates central direction. On a national scale the C. A. A. was largely responsible for the sentiment back home that permitted many Congressmen to vote for the Smith-Connally act. Indeed, the wording of this act is similar to that of the nine state laws.

The C. A. A. works out of Houston, Texas. Its leaders are said to have set up headquarters there in order to have access to the political apparatus of Senator Pass-the-Biscuits-Pappy O'Daniel. Though it devotes most of its energy to fighting the labor movement, its leaders have wider horizons. On July 2, 1942, Lewis Valentine Ulrey, chairman of the association, wrote to Vance Muse, secretary:

> Personally, I firmly believe that we have come to Armageddon, the great struggle between Christianity and Jewish Marxism. The Talmudists were so successful in Russia, and by 1935 they had such open success with the New Deal in the United States, that they decided to openly restore the Sanhedrin, which they did by selecting, naming, and labeling "120 Outstanding Jews." These are the modern Jewish Sanhedrin members, or Elders of Zion. Rabbi Wise of New York is one; Felix Frankfurter is another. . . .
> Our Christian American movement is not anti-Semitic per se. . . . For the present, the Christian American movement fights hardest against radicalism and racketeering in labor organizations—most particularly the C. I. O.

Its efforts have not always succeeded. The legislature of Louisiana was not impressed by the C. A. A. line. It defeated a bill submitted by C. A. A. agents, and adopted a resolution saying that the organization would "set capital against labor, Negro against white, Catholic against Protestant, and Christian against Jew." It charged that representatives of the C. A. A. had "harassed, annoyed, and threatened" members of the state legislature for the promotion of legislation which would "create animosity, antagonism, and unrest among the employers and employees of this state and interfere with the harmonious relations between capital and labor." The Louisiana lawmakers then asked the FBI to investigate the organization. However, last February Muse wrote to the chief clerk of the Arkansas House of Representatives, "I have in my possession a letter from Hon. J. Edgar Hoover, dated July 6, 1942, in which he states that the FBI had no cause or inclination to investigate us." Furthermore, he said, "a representative of the Dies committee was prevailed upon to look over our books and records last summer and we were given a clean bill of health."

In Florida the C. A. A. was more successful. The Florida Act to Regulate the Activities and Affairs of Labor Unions, Their Officers, Agents, Members, Organizers, and Other Representatives combines the virtues of placing unions under strict state control and of prohibiting them from contributing financially to the New Deal's 1944 campaign chest. A few hours after it was passed Eddie Rickenbacker came through with congratulations.

For one thing, the Florida law gives the state the power to decide who shall and who shall not be union officials. Section 4 says:

> No person shall be granted a license or permit to act as a business agent in the state of Florida (1) who has not been a citizen of and has not resided in the United States for a period of more than ten years next prior to making application for such license or permit; (2) who has been convicted of a felony; (3) who is not a person of good moral character. [My emphasis.]

Each application is to be held for thirty days before the Secretary of State issues a license. During this time any person, union member or not, may file objections to issuance of the license. The application and objections are then considered by a board consisting of the Governor as chairman, the Secretary of State, and the Superintendent of Education. Thus a state political machine may enjoy the right to prevent an elected union official from taking office.

The law also forbids sitdown strikes, calls for submission of regular financial reports, ends secondary picketing, and sharply limits regular picketing. To make assurance doubly sure, the law provides that "an action may be commenced by the Attorney General of the state on complaint of any interested party for the suspension or revocation of the license of any business agent for the violation of this act." In effect, this opens the way to any business man or group to depose an officer of a union.

But the C. A. A.'s greatest success has been in its home state. The Manford law in Texas has sixteen sections crammed with prohibitions which "contravene every elementary right of trade unions [and] defy fairness and justice," according to a special A. F. of L. report on C. A. A. laws made available to me recently. The A. F. of L. points out that the Texas law goes farther than any other in giving the state control over the internal affairs of unions.

It stipulates, for example, that union officers must be elected by a majority vote. The Governor and other state officials can win office by a plurality vote; not so a union manager. In addition, union officers' terms are limited to one year. Labor unions are forbidden to make financial contributions to any political party or to any person running for political office, though no similar restriction is placed on chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, or other employer organizations opposed to unions. As in Florida, labor officials must be licensed. Moreover, the collection of union dues can be made a crime:

> It shall be unlawful for any labor union, its officers, agents, or any member, to make any charge or exaction, or to receive any moneys or initiation fees, dues, fines, assessments, or other pecuniary exactions, which will create a fund in excess of the reasonable requirements of such union.

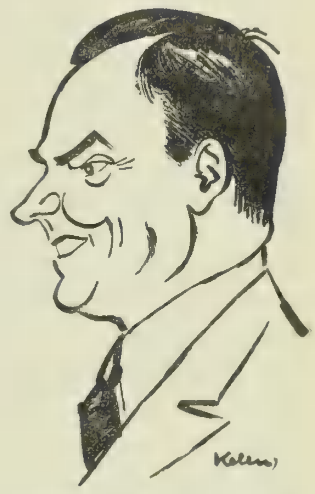
Who shall decide what is reasonable and what excessive? This provision could limit the strength and influence of a union by limiting its treasury.

The Texas law also opens the union's books to the public by providing that "any enforcement officer shall be entitled, upon demand subject to the approval of the Attorney General, at all reasonable times, to inspect such books, records, and accounts of such union." In an area where deputy sheriffs are sworn in casually as occasion arises, it would not be difficult to find an "enforcement officer" who would make the demand.

The A. F. of L. charges that if the state has power to limit the income of a labor union, then by the same principle it has power to limit the income of any religious group, any non-profit educational group, or any fraternal society; it continues:

> Of course, the power on the part of any state agency to limit the income of any person or group is the power to determine the life or death of that person or group. This provision, both by affirmative expression and by necessary implication, is of a distinctly dictatorial type in the tradition of Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany.

The Kansas law, first of the C. A. A. bills to be passed, set the pattern for all in language and content. "Every person desiring to operate as a business agent in the state of Kansas," it says, "shall before doing so obtain a license by filing an application therefor with the Secretary of State." Here too the Attorney General is empowered, on the complaint of any interested party, to begin an action "for suspension or revocation of the license of any business agent for the violation of any provision of the act." And the union's records are open to the public: "The records provided for herein shall be made available by the Secretary of State to all persons for examination and taking of copies."



Senator W. Lee O'Daniel

Similar laws, all sponsored by the C. A. A., have been passed this year in Idaho, South Dakota, Arkansas, Colorado, and Mississippi. Philip Pearl, A. F. of L. publicity agent, recently revealed that new C. A. A. drives are being planned in Iowa, North Carolina, and Tennessee.

The unions are fighting back. In Kansas, where officers of sixty unions with a combined membership of 175,000 have taken out licenses, bitter inter-union rivalry was forgotten when, on June 7, the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the Railroad Brotherhoods, and even John L. Lewis's rebel United Mine Workers joined hands to challenge the toughest of these laws in a Topeka court. Arkansas unions have been busy circulating petitions for a popular referendum to repeal the anti-picketing law, which became effective June 10. Colorado unions have brought suit to test the constitutionality of the anti-labor law, and the Texas Federation of Labor, according to the latest reports from Houston, is preparing briefs for legal action.

In the East the United Labor Committee of Philadelphia, with strong support from Sidney Hillman's Amalgamated Clothing Workers (C. I. O.), is preparing to fight the recent legislative ban on political contributions by unions. Recently leaders of the United Labor Committee and the American Labor League of New Jersey met with Alex Rose, New York State secretary of the American Labor Party, Charles Zimmerman, Charles Kerrigan, and other leaders of the Trade Union Committee of the American Labor Party to plan joint action against threatened C. A. A. legislation. They represent some 3,000,000 A. F. of L. and C. I. O. workers. This was the first time in years that the labor parties of three Eastern states had met in a joint conference to plan unified action.

However, there is not yet enough labor activity against organized reaction. The joint conference has been the only comprehensive move made to combat it, aside from sporadic attacks such as the A. F. of L.'s offensive against the C. A. A. and the United Automobile Workers' campaign against Ku Klux Klan elements in Detroit. Many of the nation's powerful international unions, either cynical because of their size and financial strength, like Lewis's United Mine Workers, or feeling secure because their own state legislatures have not yet passed C. A. A. bills, spend thousands of dollars to maintain Washington lobbies but nothing to investigate and expose the anti-labor agitators and potential men on horseback in their home territory. All important unions have legislative and educational departments, but not one in the whole country has an "anti-fascist committee." With millions in their treasuries, the unions could cripple proto-fascist anti-labor organizations by planting investigators to get information to be used later in exposing them.

The Christian Americans, America Firsters, and similar groups are winning by default. Their strength is being underestimated, their intentions judged too charitably. A high C. I. O. official, progressive, intelligent, and an excellent organizer, told me in Detroit recently that Gerald L. K. Smith had no influence in the Middle West but was being built up as a horror myth by Eastern publicity. Yet a check of the 1942 Republican Senatorial primaries in Michigan showed that Smith polled more than 100,000 votes. He ran third in a three-cornered race, but a man who persuades 100,000 people to vote for him can hardly be said to have no influence. Observers were surprised that he got so many. In view of the recent race riots in Detroit, it would appear that the type of mind to which he appeals is still very much with us. A Gerald L. K. Smith in the Senate would make the late Huey Long seem restrained.

If the New Deal's defeat at the polls in 1944 deprives labor of its protection, men like Smith will become the vigilantes of a conservative Republican Administration. Then labor will be in for its hardest battle since the heyday of the Pinkertons and the Robber Barons.

A FRIEND OF HAROLD L. ICKES recently tried to telephone him at his office. After calling the proper number, he took part in the following conversation:

"Interior."

"Mr. Ickes's office, please."

"Whose office?"

"Ickes's."

"How do you spell it, please?"

"I-C-K-E-S. Ickes. He's Secretary of the Interior."

"One moment, please. I will connect you with Information."

FOR MOVIE FANS: "Battle of Britain," a film made by Frank Capra for the United States Army, is being shown to enthusiastic audiences in England. The American public has not been allowed to see it. . . . The Legion of Decency, official Catholic movie guide, lists "For Whom the Bell Tolls" as "Objectionable in part. Objection: Suggestive situation; indication of justification of homicide; excessive brutality." . . . Variety reports from Hollywood that Warner Brothers is reshooting part of the finale of "This Is the Army" because words of the song "We're Dressed to Kill" "are not symbolic of the humane manner in which the United States has waged war." To spare the sensibility of the movie audience the words will be "We're Out to Win."

MAN-POWER: A Cleveland department store now hands its customers leaflets offering them jobs as clerks. . . . In St. Louis a department store runs an outdoor employment office and hires people off the street. . . . A New Jersey varnish company is considering a plan to give its employees "bounties" of $10 or $15 if they bring in new employees who last three months.

THE NEGRO (REAR) SECTION of a bus in Miami, Florida, was full. The new passenger, a forty-seven-year-old Negro woman, sat in the last seat of the white section. Result, arrest. Charge, disorderly conduct. Sentence, a day in jail.

FESTUNG EUROPA: A newspaper in Norway recently carried this want ad: "Will trade well-used map of Africa for a good map of Italy." . . . The Nazis are confiscating the money and property of Norwegian traitors who have made fortunes out of their building contracts with the occupation forces. Most of these so-called "barracks barons" are now bankrupt or back where they started from. . . . Many Czech manufacturers have been asking payment in advance or substantial deposits on orders from Germany. The Prague radio warns that such manufacturers "are taking the risk of being treated with great severity."

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The French Revolution Goes On

BY ANDRE MAROSELLI

MORE than a century and a half has passed since the people of France stormed the prison of the Bastille and by that act lit the torch of a great continuing revolution in the world. The struggle has never ceased between the partisans of the French Revolution and its adversaries. Today in France the enemies of the revolution appear to have the upper hand. But the conflict will not end until the forces of progress have achieved a new order based on political, economic, and international democracy—on liberty, equality, and fraternity.

I am proud to have played a part in this struggle. As a Senator of the Republic and a militant democrat, I was named as a hostage and thrown into prison, there to share the suffering of France's best sons. I was fortunate enough to escape the firing squad, but for long weeks we went to sleep at night sure that the next morning we would be lined up against a wall.

With the aid of our allies I managed to get out of France and to join other parliamentarians of the Republic in London. There I immediately entered the service of General de Gaulle. My past career authorizes me, I think, to speak for those who have remained faithful to the spirit of the French Revolution; the message I bring is of their devotion to the Republic, their support of General de Gaulle, their confidence in our allies.

First of all, I would emphasize the French people's unshaken devotion to the Republic. They have not been influenced by the lies of those who attribute the fall of France to the "corruption" of the Third Republic. Rather the prestige of the Republic and of its elected leaders has been enhanced by the statements of Léon Blum and Edouard Daladier at Riom, the historic letter of Jeanneney and Herriot denouncing the Pétain regime, the assassination of Marx Dormoy, the death of three deputies—Peri, shot by the Germans, and Catelas and Michel, guillotined by Vichy's order—the arrest of many parliamentarians and trade-union leaders, the courage of workers engaged in sabotage, the heroism of the francs-tireurs. In the same measure French fascism and the military dictatorship have been forever dishonored by accepting the support of Hitler. A pamphleteer once wrote that the Republic was fair and well loved under the Empire; you may be sure that it has never been fairer or more beloved than under Pétain.

Just as during the French Revolution, the words patriot and republican are synonymous today. By that I do not mean that only the republicans or all the republicans are participating in the underground fight against Hitlerism; no party, no organization, no committee—not even that of National Liberation—can claim a monopoly of patriotism. But for reasons easy to understand the most militant forces are the workers, the peasants, the petits bourgeois, and the anti-fascist intellectuals who combined in 1934 to defend the Republic and who remain united to defend France. For them the struggle against Hitlerism is no novelty; it is a continuation, under singularly difficult conditions, of the battle that began on February 6, 1934, against the enemies of the Republic.

The second point I wish to underline is that French republicans support General de Gaulle. I do not mean to balance one name against another, a general against a marshal, or even a general against other generals. And lest there be any doubt, allow me to hail the arrival in the United States of General Giraud, soldier of two world wars, patriot, commander-in-chief of the French armies, whose courage and dignity have won universal respect. As for the support given to General de Gaulle, the reasons for it are very simple. In the first place, he has become the symbol of resistance to the Nazi invader and his Vichy accomplices. We have no right to forget that in June, 1940, while so many other honest men pondered which road to take, General de Gaulle saved the honor of France. In the second place, more as a result of the course of events than of men's decisions, the Free French committee in London has become a rallying-point against the men and ideas of Vichy. Eight or ten months ago it seemed that the attempt was being made to launch a movement in North Africa which would offset the democratic platform of the National Committee in London. Into the high councils of this movement began to filter men well known for their participation in the fascist agitation before 1940 and in the politics of collaboration after 1940. These men seemed to find it amazingly simple to leave continental France for North Africa, to join a group which included even the Count of Paris. We grew anxious. Before and after the landing of American troops, vigilant republicans, rightly or wrongly, began to fear that financiers, industrialists, and former ministers of the Vichy government were seeking to have the British and American authorities ratify the regime imposed on unhappy France by German arms. Was the plot against the Republic to continue unchecked? Was the so-called "national revolution"—which is, in fact, an anti-French counter-revolution—to be saved at all costs? Was the work of Marshal Pétain, spokesman for the builders of concentration camps and the teachers of racism, to be preserved? After democracy had been strangled with the aid of Hitler, was it to be kept in its grave by consent of the Allies?

THE POPE'S PROTEST

Since the tide of war began to beat against the walls of Fortress Europe, the propaganda efforts of the Axis have become less and less effective. Talk about a negotiated peace, attempts to drive a wedge between Russia and the western Allies have small results when the fascist powers are in retreat on the eastern front and in Sicily. But just at this critical hour for the Axis forces the Pope has given them an invaluable weapon against the Allies. No direct Nazi propaganda, however cleverly calculated, could have such widespread and damaging consequences as the protest against the bombing of Rome issued as if in a spirit of pure sorrow by the head of the Catholic church. By putting the Allied and Axis powers on an equal footing ("we called upon the belligerents on both sides, if they wanted to hold the dignity of their countries high and the honor of their arms, to respect . . .") the Pope subtly betrays the moral position of the enemies of the Axis. By dwelling on the destruction wrought by Allied planes despite his earnest pleas, he manages to present the Allies as indifferent to religious feeling and the sacred monuments of Holy Rome. And he concludes with the recommendation that all Catholics pray for an early peace—a recommendation which may easily release a new barrage of propaganda for a negotiated peace from appeasers and pro-Nazi elements everywhere. The effect of the Pope's statement will be to lower the prestige of the Allies in all neutral, especially in Catholic, countries. If it was not deliberately directed to this end, it was an ill-considered, irresponsible utterance. And the Pope is not given to tossing off statements without thought of their effect.

Our preoccupation with these dangers was bound to draw us toward the French committee in London. We knew that General de Gaulle, like us, wanted to drive out the evil bergers and with them the evil Bergerets. We knew that De Gaulle's presence in North Africa would cause Pétain's portraits to disappear, end the anti-democratic propaganda which was making forays into our youth and the army, and close the concentration camps whose existence dishonored the name of France.

Today French republicans support the Committee of Liberation as earlier they supported the London National Committee. The Committee of Liberation has made clear that it is not a government; its members were not elected by the French people; its composition does not give a true picture of our resistance since it includes no workers or farmers. But the committee has taken charge of French interests. It is, to use an American legal term, a sort of voluntary "trustee," or to use the more exact French phrase, a gérant d'affaires. It will coordinate resistance by supplying arms and means of action to the fighters within France. It will bring France into the war again on the side of the Allies. It will administer the liberated territories under the laws of the Republic. And when France is free again, it will hand over its power to the chosen representatives of the people.

The French people, and they alone, have the right to choose the government France shall have. The duty of all Frenchmen faithful to the tradition of the French Revolution is to recall this cardinal point of republican doctrine, set forth in the immortal Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen. According to the law of the Republic, as soon as half of the general councils are liberated they will constitute an assembly charged with the administration of the country, and must within one month call for general elections. If by chance this law should be violated, if, under one of those pretexts so convenient to aspiring dictators, elections should not be called, another provision of the Declaration of the Rights of Man of 1793 declares that "insurrection is, for the whole people and for every section of the people, not only a right but an absolute duty."

We can avoid such a situation by following the Committee of Liberation with our eyes open. We have confidence in its two presidents and its members. We ask that they discharge their duty by clearing out the fascists in civil and military posts. We demand an immediate end to the anti-Semitism which has been encouraged by the illegal revocation of the Crémieux decree.

The third thing I want to speak of is the confidence that the French republicans place in our allies. This confidence is one of the principal elements in French resistance; anything which weakens it weakens our efforts. It is the duty of us who are outside France to cement and safeguard those friendships on which France depends for its liberation. We shall not fulfil that duty by arrogance or demagogic xenophobia.

Our compatriots in the underground, the real builders of a new Free France, will never forget our country's debt to the people and the governments of Great Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union. The immense debt owed by all humanity to the Soviet Union has particular meaning for the French people, who today recognize the need of restoring the traditional alliance of France and Russia. Each day the French republicans learn new lessons from the admirable example of the Russian people. If they have any request to place before the Allied governments, it is that every effort be made to relieve those men and women who until now have borne the full weight of the war.

French republicans are equally loyal to Franco-British friendship. They know that tomorrow this amity will be one of the keystones of international organization. They know the full measure of responsibility that France incurred in the most tragic hour of its history when Marshal Pétain, preferring fascism to democracy, refused to move his government to Algiers and continue the struggle at Britain's side. They will never forget that without Winston Churchill, General de Gaulle would not have been able to issue his first call, to form his committee, or organize his propaganda.

Finally, the French people have confidence in the United States and its President. In their eyes the American people are the champions of democracy. They recall the bonds that linked the French Revolution and the American Revolution, the fraternal ties between the spiritual parents of the declarations of the Rights of Man that were drawn up at nearly the same time by the French and American democrats.

The French people are acquainted with the statements of President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill which affirm that their political liberty will be restored. If they accept without discussion the authority of the Committee of Liberation, if they are willing to close their eyes to its faults and mistakes—reserving their full anger for the partisans of collaboration—it is because they believe that the committee, as an agent for the restoration of France's national sovereignty, has the indorsement of President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill.

For the last 150 years the powers of reaction have leagued together on various occasions to stifle reason, truth, and liberty. But each time, as soon as they could, the French people have turned with renewed faith to the Republic. Today as in the past they have taken their stand for the revolutionary concepts on which the Republic was founded.

BY ARGUS

PROPAGANDA in Germany appears to be a thing of the past. It no longer has any effect. This is amply shown by the total failure of the attempt to use R. A. F. bombings to stir up a fury of hate against the English.

The propaganda machine did its utmost. For months it surpassed itself in the matter of invectives. It made every effort to convince the public that the English had begun this kind of warfare and that they alone were infamous enough to commit such barbarities. Its success was nil. In recent months thousands of letters from Germany have fallen into the hands of the Allies with the capture of the prisoners to whom they were written. Many were from the bombed regions. In most of them the bombings and their effects were described more or less fully. Not two in a thousand contained a word of hatred for the English. Obviously the Germans realize that the English are justified in making these attacks, that their course of action is perfectly normal.

The ineffectiveness of the authorities' feverish campaign has had this curious result: they are now overwhelming the people with reproaches for feeling so little hate. A front-page article in the Völkische Beobachter of July 3 heaps abuse on the non-haters. It is entitled "Moral Shirkers"; and a moral shirker is described as one who appears indifferent to the hate urge. "Who has not met that kind of 'innocent'?" the writer asks. "He reads his paper, listens to broadcasts, talks with friends, and yet there are certain things he simply does not want to know. He does not want to hear that the Cologne cathedral has been bombed by the British. He has his own opinion about it, and he avoids hearing what others think. Such moral shirkers are incomprehensible. They are cowards without realizing it and unworthy of the times we live in."

The Swedish newspaper Arbetaren of July 13 printed the following brief dispatch from Germany: A Dortmund workman named Heigehern said publicly that it was time to erect a monument to Field Marshal Göring in the Ruhr. The man was arrested and sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

There are signs that the food problem in Germany is becoming more serious. The Hamburger Fremdenblatt of July 11 devotes an article to the subject beginning with the ominous words: "Complaints are being heard among the people that the food situation is hardly better than in 1918, and that with respect to certain articles it is worse." The newspaper opposed to these complaints a comparison of the 1918 rations with those of today and came to the conclusion that only the ration of marmalade is smaller; the ration of meat is the same, and all other rations are larger.

That may be so. Although the rations as they are fixed on paper are at times not actually available, it has so far been possible to say that people get enough, in quantity, to fill their stomachs. But quantity alone, over an extended period, does not suffice. The German diet is in fact disgustingly monotonous and unappetizing. As a woman wrote sarcastically to her husband at the front, "Yesterday we had toast and potatoes for supper; today we had potatoes and toast." In the fourth year of war the people are beginning to feel that they are just as miserably nourished as in 1918, or even more so.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Brecht: Poetry, Drama, and the People

THE TRIAL OF LUCULLUS: A Verse Play for the Radio by Bertolt Brecht. Translated by H. R. Hays. New Directions. Bound edition $1. Pamphlet edition 50 cents.

IT IS curious to watch the delayed and erratic flow of foreign literature into English translation. Rilke came in a few years ago like a tidal wave; then came Kierkegaard nearly a century late; only yesterday Stefan George arrived; today it is the turn of Bertolt Brecht. This is an important event for all who are interested in present tendencies of poetry and the drama, though it means reopening all those problems of poetry and the left, poetry and propaganda, poetry and the people, which are assumed to have passed away with the red decade. As to the drama, it is not only the leftist brand that has disappeared; there is simply no drama at all these days with any quality or any future in it. That at least is one's general impression of the English-speaking theater, and that is why, not for the first time in theater history, one turns eagerly to translations from the German.

Bertolt Brecht is one of the best living poets and one of the very few living dramatists worth mentioning. Unfortunately, however, his lyric poetry is as unsuccessful in translation as George's, yet for precisely opposite reasons: George uses a kind of poetic diction which in translation is merely precious; Brecht uses a tricky kind of colloquialism which in translation is merely commonplace. The explanation seems to be that the German language and German literature are, in some respects, at an earlier stage than English and that therefore a German poet can still adopt either a traditional poetic diction or a traditional popular style without making a fool of himself. George is indeed the leading modern in the literary tradition of Goethe and Hoelderlin; Brecht, the leading modern in a popular tradition that goes back to Luther and Hans Sachs. I emphasize the word modern, for Brecht is not a pure folk poet but also the parodist of folk poetry, a sarcastic mind, superficially anti-literary, fundamentally lyrical, tough, angular, righteously indignant, all that Auden in his satiric days tried to be. But Auden's wit was always that of a clever and rather priggish undergraduate, and since a poet cannot be perpetually precocious, one guessed that he would take to religion. Brecht, on the other hand, has always been an engaging blend of introvert and extrovert, never so tender-minded that the tough exterior looked like affectation. More successfully than almost anyone else he fused the idiom and rhythm of prose with a resilient verse. In his attempt to break down the disastrous modern antithesis of highbrow and lowbrow he created out of the vernacular something we are not often vouchsafed these days—a poetic style, firm, simple, and ironic.

In the course of the past twenty years Brecht has written some six kinds of drama. He began with plays that were at once expressionistic and psychological; second, he wrote the most telling satiric librettos (for Kurt Weill and Hanns Eisler) at least since W. S. Gilbert and probably since John Gay; third, he invented a much-publicized didactic drama in which choruses, chanting to an orchestral accompaniment, purveyed a political gospel; fourth, he has scribbled some propaganda pieces close to the style and the level of current popular drama, such as "Señora Carrar's Rifles" and the script of Fritz Lang's "Hangmen Also Die"; fifth, he has attempted to present a composite picture of the Third Reich in his most ambitious project, in verse and prose, "Misery and Fear," one scene of which is shortly to be published in The Nation; sixth, he has attempted several historical plays whose meaning is entirely contemporary. "The Trial of Lucullus" is one of these.

"The Trial of Lucullus" tells how a great Roman conqueror appears after his death before a judge and jury who are to decide whether he should go to Hades or to the Elysian Fields. The jury, consisting of a farmer, a teacher, a fishwife, a baker, and a courtesan, allows Lucullus to summon as witnesses the people portrayed on a frieze representing his triumphal procession. All the evidence is against Lucullus except that he brought back from the East a cherry tree, that he wept over the destruction of books, and that he encouraged good cooking. The story ends thus:

> And from the high bench they rise up
> The ancestors of the world-to-be,
> The world with many hands to take
> With many mouths to eat,
> The hard to deceive, the firmly united,
> The joyous world-to-be.
> The tribunal withdraws to consider the verdict.

"The Trial of Lucullus" is neither a lengthy nor a major work. It is a short "radio play in verse," a play in which the military-heroic ideal of conquest is poignantly denounced by the common man and in which psychological distance is achieved by austerity of style and remoteness of period. There is nothing very complex about this, but since when we hear nowadays of a "radio play in verse" by an author with propagandist intentions we forthwith prepare for the worst, a few words of explanation are in order. What are we afraid of? In the first place we fear the politics, because we associate political drama with our own abortive proletarian literature of the now despised thirties. But Brecht's political emphasis is neither a phase nor a fad; he was political before the thirties and remains political after. "The Trial of Lucullus" is not of the Mike Gold mint. One must simply admi that from the artistic point of view political emotion is jus as good a basis for a poet as any other and an excellent poin of contact, at least now that the war is on, with his audience

Our second fear is fear of poetry in drama. It is true tha T. S. Eliot straightened out the theory of it for us when h observed that dramatic poetry was a specific type of poetry not an arbitrary union of two modes, the dramatic and th poetic, and when in his own dramatic verse he provided th recipe—a racy, modern speech on top, a tremendous emotional pressure underneath. But the fact remains that neithe

Eliot nor Auden nor any of the others achieved more than an effective dialogue; the incomplete state of the brilliant "Sweeney Agonistes" bears eloquent witness to this. No more than Tennyson and Swinburne, therefore, have the moderns created a verse drama. So we are skeptical. Does Bertolt Brecht remove our doubts? Not altogether, in so slight a work as this, but at least we feel in reading "The Trial of Lucullus" the possibility of a modern verse drama—giving full and equal weight to both words.

Our third fear is our fear of the radio, for here too we have been disappointed. Like the cinema, the radio has been regarded as a possible means to a renewal of good popular art, but in fact both radio and cinema have become more and more commercialized, and most directors who were experimenters twenty years ago are complacent hacks today. Serious writers were slow to find the peculiar potentialities of the new mediums and continued to bring stage plays before the microphone and the camera. When the poetic radio play did arrive, it was bound to be merely the affair of special "workshops," and anyway, if MacLeish's efforts are typical, it was more bombastic and pretentious than popular. Does Brecht have a remedy for all this? Of course not. But his play is wholly conceived in terms of radio, that is, it is simply an aural time-sequence with visual imagery instead of spectacle, with a carefully planned rhythm and a musical symmetry, with a poetry that consists of the best spoken words in the best order, with a bias or emotional prejudice which listeners share, with a tang and a hardheadedness which they can enjoy. Nevertheless, I cannot imagine the play being a commercial success. It is simple, but simplicity is itself a style, and a style very different from that of the show business.

"The Trial of Lucullus," then, shares the fate of most proletarian literature in that it is published by a minority press and is noticed only by the literary journals. This is not the fault of Bertolt Brecht. His difficulty is that in our time the good in art can only be popular by an accident, and even when the masses enjoy Brecht they enjoy him only for what he has in common with Stefan Heym and other third-raters who write thrillers about the Nazis. The prerequisite of a great popular art, as Whitman and other realistic democrats have allowed, is a great populace and not a people drugged by opiates every bit as strong as religion. Until this condition is fulfilled, Bertolt Brecht will be important only to the intelligentsia; after it is fulfilled, paradoxically enough, propaganda will be gratuitous. ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

Prelude in Sicily

COMBINED OPERATIONS: THE OFFICIAL STORY OF THE COMMANDOS. The Macmillan Company. $2.

ON JULY 10 an Anglo-American army began to harvest on the Sicilian beaches a crop sown in Britain just three years and one month earlier. It was then—a week after the evacuation from Dunkirk—that Britain began to prepare to hit back. The situation was truly desperate, for both trained troops and weapons were lacking even for defense of the island. Yet at that hour Winston Churchill and the Imperial General Staff approved a plan for training a special force designed to harass the enemy along his vast newly won coast line.

So the Commandos were born, and within two weeks they had made their first reconnaissance raid across the Channel. This book tells their subsequent story down to the landings in North Africa in November, 1942—the greatest combined operation of all times until the invasion of Sicily. As a result of the experiences of the Commandos new methods of training for amphibious warfare were evolved and later applied to large numbers of British, American, and Dominion troops. Soldiers, sailors, and airmen were taught how to work together in perfecting the arts of a three-dimensional offensive. How well the lessons were learned we can now appreciate.

Men who volunteer for commando service go through a course which is both rigorous and unconventional. Great emphasis is placed on the individual, and everything is done to develop self-confidence and self-reliance. There is a story —not in this book—of an officer detached for commando training who was ordered to report at the other end of the country within forty-eight hours but was given no railroad pass. He arrived a few hours late and was severely reprimanded by a superior, who waved aside his explanation of the difficulties involved with the question: "Don't you know how to steal a car?" This yarn may be apocryphal, but it illustrates the fact that commandos are encouraged to forget the usual rules of military etiquette just as they are taught to become expert in those forms of mayhem which British magistrates have been wont to condemn as peculiarly un-British—knifing, sandbagging, and garroting.

The Commandos have conducted a wide variety of operations in many different lands. The party which one dark night neatly gathered up the six guards of a Nazi-held lighthouse comprised only a handful of men; other raids have been made by comparatively large numbers. The geographical range of their adventures has been immense. The Commandos' farthest north has been Spitzbergen, where a radio station and coal mines operating for German benefit were destroyed; their farthest south, Madagascar, where they were in the van when that Vichy-held island was invaded.

The two most important enterprises described in this book are the attacks on St. Nazaire and Dieppe. The first of these was an expensive but highly successful raid which caused great damage to an important U-boat base and inflicted heavy personnel losses on the Germans. The second is given a great deal of space here, but many of the details necessary for a final judgment on the operation are withheld. We are not told, for instance, what was the real objective of the raid and how far it was achieved. It is described as a "reconnaissance in force" intended to test out the strength of the enemy defenses, and the author asserts that the lessons gained have proved immensely valuable. Maybe so, but they were certainly extremely costly. This was partly due to bad luck, which prevented surprise being achieved by the eastern flanking party, but the heaviest losses were suffered in the course of the frontal attack on the town of Dieppe itself. There on a narrow strip of beach, shut in by two beetling cliffs bristling with artillery, the Canadians and the Commandos strove mightily but in vain to establish a foothold. It is difficult to understand why so much effort was expended at the center after it must have become clear that the main flanking parties had not succeeded in reaching their objectives. The one group that was able to report "mission completed" was Lord Lovat's, which at a comparatively low cost destroyed the heavy battery some six miles west of the town.

Although this book has no author's name on its title-page, it is the most open of secrets that it was written by Hilary St. George Saunders—one-half of the well-known mystery writing team of Francis Beeding. One cannot praise the book more highly than by saying that it fully maintains the standards of the series of books, prepared by Mr. Saunders and others, in which the British government has reported the course of the war to the people. The pictures and maps are excellent. KEITH HUTCHISON

American Beginnings

WESTERN STAR. By Stephen Vincent Benét. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

AFTER the success of "John Brown's Body," Stephen Vincent Benét began work on a much longer poem which was to have dealt with the beginnings of America and the long filling-in process, the drive to the West. "Western Star" was to have been the first book of the long poem.

As published now, "Western Star" is an incomplete and unfinished work and should, in justice to Mr. Benét, be judged as such. While long episodes appear to be complete, there are passages here and there, some of them, in fact, in prose, which could be nothing more than notes for work which the poet intended to finish later. One also finds a few ideas expressed which, while interesting enough in themselves, are not quite proper in the sense that they don't fit the subject and method of the poem. Surely they would have been elided had Mr. Benét lived long enough to complete what easily could have been his major work.

Taken as it is in its unpolished and unedited stage, "Western Star" remains a moving and entertaining work and, I think, a timely one. There is a sometimes rollicking and sometimes starry-eyed prelude, the most finished part of the book, and then in episodic fashion Benét tells the story of the people who settled Jamestown and Massachusetts, examines their reasons for doing so, describes the ordeal of their voyages and the frequently painful and bloody task of getting their roots down in the soil of an almost virgin land.

This is the story of the men who propagandized the little people of England into believing there was gold and plenty of it in the New World and who ended up by believing it themselves, the story of the true adventurers like Raleigh, of the administrators like Delaware, but mostly it is the story of Dickon Heron, the apprentice who became a free landowner in Virginia, the first Englishman to plant tobacco, the true gold, and who lost his life to the Indians; and it is the story of Matthew Lanyard, the good Puritan.

Mr. Benét was one of the few poets who succeeded in writing poetry at sustained length and on a relatively popular level without at the same time being cheap and false. "Western Star" is easy to read; it moves along, whether in the quick short steps of those portions dealing with Dickon or the more sedate passages devoted to Matthew and the Puritans, with a definite propulsion which only rarely fails. No matter how impressed we may be with the poet's intentions, or what we consider them to be, "Western Star" is in toto not a great work. It will in all likelihood be a popular one, and this is a good thing. Poetry has tended to move too far away from the stream of life in appeal if not in subject, and I for one am glad that Mr. Benét has increased its area of communication. CHARLES ALLDREDGE

The Old Technique

THE BATTLE FOR BUENOS AIRES. By Sax Bradford. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

IT IS not really an accident that a book with such a title as this was published on the very day of the coup d' état in Buenos Aires. Everyone who had been watching Argentine affairs since Pearl Harbor knew that something had to happen there. The book is a description of that explosive period of inaction which marked Argentina's first attitude toward the World War. People who do not understand what is occurring now in the Argentine might look here for their answer.

The author sets out quietly and seriously to tell about Nazi penetration. His material is not sensational in being new; it is just the old, incredible story. It has been pointed out by our own State Department, by the newspapers of the whole hemisphere, and even by detailed reports of a special investigating committee of the Argentine Chamber of Deputies. We all know that the ambassador, von Thermann, tried to send a radio transmitter into Peru as diplomatic baggage, and that Berlin provides Argentine papers with the Transocean news service free of charge. What we have been slow to realize, however, is that this campaign of the Nazis is no different from their penetration—and presumably their purpose—in any of the occupied countries of Europe. In the Argentine every factor of a pre-blitz situation is present—the frightened autocrats, the Communist bugaboo, the political-minded church, the morbid minorities (in this case European refugee groups, such as the Ukrainians), the mistrust of neighboring countries (so unsuitable to the Western Hemisphere), and finally the interruption of democratic procedures. The Germans supplied organization, funds, zealous Nazi party men, and pressure on their normally friendly compatriots. And now they have revolution.

The revolution in the Argentine is in a sense more serious than the invasion; that is, the attempt to destroy democratic government is more dangerous when it comes from within a country than from the hands of a foreign enemy. The Germans are certainly there, but they did not create the situation which gives them scope. The rich landowners, the autocratic army, the myopic clergy, the statesmen who failed to educate the great back country and to incorporate it in the national life—such groups as these are responsible for the state of their nation. The author, although he is justified in skirting the complexities of Argentine internal politics, is quite aware of this. I think he clouds the issue by his opinion that Buenos Aires is not really American but a spiritual extension of Europe, and for this reason reacts as the European countries did to a Nazi campaign. Uruguay and Brazil are equally European in their cultural alignment, but they rose in healthy indignation against the German methods. The simple fact is that the Argentine was susceptible to Nazi activities because it was afraid of democracy—a fact which cannot be too strongly or too often repeated.

Now the oligarchy, who had been afraid they would have to live in a world dominated by a victorious Germany, are beginning to fear that they will have to face a victorious Brazil and Chile instead. This is a good omen for a victory of the United Nations, but it means nothing for the cause of democracy in the Argentine. That has still to be fought out; that is the real battle of Buenos Aires. Our impression that the Argentine people are sound and will in the end prevail is an indication of the author's faith, in a book largely given over to sensational disclosures. Consider that Damonte Taborda's committee brought out accurate, detailed reports of the Nazi activities in the face of opposition from almost every government official, and of the most disheartening inaction. The two newspapers of Buenos Aires consistently and courageously criticized the inaction and connivance of their government. The pressure of public opinion actually did drive von Thermann home—though the government declined to rebuke him. There is a rapidly maturing middle class in Buenos Aires—with a majority of the essentially liberty-loving North Italians—and one cannot believe that these people will be held down forever by any clique.

The author also makes it clear that we North Americans have no ground for condescension. Passing over such items as the Condor-Lati line's rushing propaganda from Rome to the Argentine on gas provided by a North American company, or the self-interest of the cattlemen's lobby in Washington, he dissects the faults of the tourist, the business man, and the foreign official of the United States. We have done nothing to lend even moral support to the forces of democracy in the other Americas. It is a good thing for us to read this book, which brings together more fully and more clearly than before the story of Germany's power in our hemisphere. We had better realize that it has happened here—and face our responsibility.

"This Terrible Mystery"

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA. By Lewis Sowden. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

IT IS Mr. Sowden's thesis that "these last three years have brought South Africa to the threshold of a new era in its history, an era which must bring decisive departure from the outlook and policy of the past and development along new lines and in accordance with new concepts." There can be no doubt that South Africa needs some such change of outlook and policy, but the evidence Mr. Sowden marshals to support his thesis that the change is impending is not exactly overwhelming. In fact, when he outlines the problems of the Union, suggests their genesis, and states the views entertained by the conflicting political groups, he provides the data to refute the optimism which he cultivates. Fortunately or unfortunately he is temperamentally unable to concede that the evil policies he holds up to scorn may be victorious in the future as they have been in the past. To him his own case seems so sound, so inevitably right, that he cannot convince himself that it may be decisively rejected. He quotes admirable sentiments in his support from Prime Minister Jan Smuts, but he fails to recall that Smuts has also said, "Look how old Africa is, how strangely made, how unaltered. What is there in it that baffles us? Brilliant men come here to solve its problems and go away defeated. But that is why it holds us, it has this terrible mystery."

For the Union of South Africa is a nation that no one would think of inventing if it did not already exist. It is a seething mass of terrifying problems, fateful difficulties, awe-inspiring troubles. Every other British dominion, even Eire, is a placid land by comparison. Every economic problem to which modern society is heir is in the Union exasperated by being expressed in a context of racial and cultural conflict. Britain versus Boer, white versus black, Occidental versus Oriental—these issues are acute and enduring. Mr. Sowden candidly outlines them for the general reader, no one better. He sometimes pursues them into rather tiresome detail, as in his discussion of the Boer language. But perhaps even that is to the good, for it makes clear that in South Africa even linguistics is a political issue. He shows how the whites have jockeyed themselves into the position of disadvantaging themselves to disadvantage the blacks, and spent incredible energy to insure that they shall not be rescued from their situation. He shows how the introduction of Indians as a labor force about eighty years ago has injected into the already overburdened Union a race conflict so intense that it has already produced a leader of the oppressed famous the world around, Mahatma Gandhi. It is perhaps fortunate that many Americans will get their first introduction to these difficulties from Mr. Sowden, whose calmness and balance of mind approach flaccidity, rather than from a man with more iron in his personality and pen who might make them as exasperating as they really are.

And these racial conflicts go on within an economy which Mr. Sowden, following expert testimony of many writers, correctly describes as precariously balanced, if balanced at all. It is founded on gold. But since this foundation is an uncertain quantity, the struggle to find an alternative has necessarily been undertaken, thus far with little success. Probably no more impressive object lesson in the futility of subsidized production in agriculture can be had than the case of South Africa. Mr. Sowden minces no words in demonstrating the shaky nature of the Union's economy.

Yet with this lurid backdrop in plain sight of the audience, Mr. Sowden insists on sketching a drama of rehabilitation that, to my mind, is so compounded of the miraculous as to be quite unbelievable. He would have it that the present war is rapidly purging away the Union's past, that its citizens are being shorn of their inherited prejudices, and that the next step is toward a Utopia which by contrast sharply reveals the shocking character of present-day reality. Only those powerfully supplied with the will-to-believe will follow Mr. Sowden. His undiscussed premise is a mass conversion for which there is no historical precedent. He lacks a tragic sense of life and destiny, without which no one should write about the Union of South Africa.

FRIDAY, THANK GOD! By Fern Rives. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THE spiritual hazards, the occupational disorders, of the teaching profession have seldom been the subject of serious and sympathetic treatment in literature; what we more often get is either scathing satirical caricature or squashy sentimentality, Ichabod Crane or Mr. Chips, or their female counterparts. Fern Rives's catchily entitled novel is an attempt in the right direction, with chapters and passages that dispose the reader to think, How good this is, for a change! But the treatment as a whole is not quite serious—I do not mean solemn—enough: the intention strays into frivolity, and both events and characters seem not so much observed, or even imagined, as supposed, or contrived, with an eye, perhaps, on Hollywood. The extension of the novel's commodity value being what it is, is there a novelist, however austere, who does not cast so much as one single sidelong ogle in the direction of Paramount or Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer?

In devising a structure for her narrative and establishing a unity of time, the author has confined the events of the story to the period of a single week, Friday to Friday, inclusive. This convention imposes considerable strain on the reader's capacity for suspension of disbelief; for even in the most hectic pedagogical lives, it is hardly credible that the time chart should include an attempt at murder, an attempt at adultery, an attempt at political seduction, and an attempt to discharge an incompetent teacher for incompetence. Truer to life, perhaps, is the fact that none of these events comes off quite as scheduled, and in the end we find the characters putting brave and happy faces on what would seem to be, in each instance, the second choice.

One may likewise demur a little at some of the characters. It is gratifying that Miss Rives has not repeated the stock types, nor been too insistent on symbolic figures; and it is also gratifying to find her heroine plausible, if superior, and comprehensible, if perplexed. But such glamorous female gym teachers as Virginia Kelly seem unduly atypical; and such a star of the morning as Jeff Ward must be the exception rather than the rule among principals, even the go-getters with political ambitions. Moreover, the young, as presented in these pages, seem just a shade too starry-eyed; there is only one mean type and none of the specters that haunt our lassitude, those sex-hipped little wenches and callow "jerks" who neither can, nor want to, learn anything, and are tolerable only by comparison with their parents, who are the same stuff, only older and uglier.

With a little more passion, a little more perception, a little more patience, a little less delusion, a little better prose style, Miss Rives might effect a great improvement if she were willing to try again. A colleague of mine suggests that if she is minded to produce a sequel the title is ready to hand. Call it, "Oh, hell, Monday!"

IN BRIEF

THE ARABS: A SHORT HISTORY. By Philip K. Hitti. Princeton University Press. $2.

This is an abridgment of the author's unparalleled master work, "History of the Arabs," by Byron Dexter in collaboration with the author. As the book is marked on its cover "for Americans," it is probably intended for readers whose relatives are just now stationed in Arab lands. It should be read, however, by everybody who is interested in the origins of our Western civilization. Few people know that medieval scholars found their way to Plato and Aristotle through Arab scholars. Hunavn-ibn-Ishaq translated Plato and Aristotle, Galen and Hippocrates in an age when Charlemagne and his lords "dabbled in learning to write their names." Arabic civilization was at bottom Hellenized Aramaic and Iranian knowledge, but it was exactly the influx of these ideas after the conquest of Spain by the Arabs which brought the beginning of the end of the so-called Dark Ages. From the sixteenth century on the Arab East was in a state of eclipse. During the Ottoman domination Damascus and Bagdad receded into the background. An Arab national movement started in the eighteen seventies, and since it feeds not only on the glory of the past, when "warriors of Allah" built an empire vaster than the Roman, but on the fact that fifty million people speak the Arabic language, this movement, like all nationalist activities of the East, will offer a serious post-war problem. Hitti's brilliant little book facilitates its understanding and furnishes evidence of the old truth that history is not necessarily a dull science. Historians are sometimes bores, but Hitti is certainly not.

ALASKA DIARY: 1926-1931. By Ales Hrdlicka. The Jaques Cattell Press. $5.

Although the purpose of Dr. Hrdlicka's four expeditions to central and western Alaska was to obtain scientific confirmation, by means of the collection and examination of craniums and skeletons in old burials, of the migration of the primitive inhabitants of America from Asia, this chronicle of his journeys along the Yukon, Kuskokwim, and Nushagak rivers is primarily an informal account of his experiences with the country and its people. The daily notes of which the book is composed, although confessedly without "pretense to any literary value, nor to any other virtue aside from reality," are none the less too meager, as their observations are rather too attenuated, to give more than a hint of the larger perceptions which to the exploring imagination constitute the meaning, if not the virtue, of reality. For the casual layman this qualification may limit the interest of the book, but it is well worth reading for descriptions of places seldom visited, for stories of hardships endured and hospitalities enjoyed, for Dr. Hrdlicka's abundant sympathies, and, most important, for its rare accuracy.

THIS AGE OF CONFLICT. A Contemporary World History, 1914-1943. By Frank P. Chambers, Christina Phelps Grant, and Charles C. Bayley. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.50.

This long survey of international events from the First World War to the present concerns itself chiefly with political trends and treaties, military campaigns, and men of destiny. It contains a number of suggestive analyses: of the postwar temper, fascism in Italy, the forces which made for Nazism, and the philosophy of appeasement. These sections are all too brief. The authors would have done well to treat with similar concern other matters bearing on the world situation—for example, the labor movements and left-wing political parties in the various countries. The Russian Revolution, certainly, warrants a more thoughtful evaluation than they have accorded it. "Public" reactions to governmental policies are insufficiently qualified. Mr. Chambers's skilled pen raises the volume considerably above the level of a textbook, however, and his collaborators have helped make it one of the most comprehensive reviews of the past quarter-century at present available.

WE CAN WIN THIS WAR. By Colonel W. F. Kernan. Little, Brown and Company. $1.50.

Even those who were impressed by "Defense Will Not Win the War" will probably agree that, so far, Colonel Kernan is a one-book man. In this rather platitudinous afterthought, apparently written in order to cash in on the success of the first, the author chiefly repeats his previous doctrines. There are a few interesting asides, such as a defense of the Pearl Harbor commanders, Short and Kimmel, and a condemnation of the Guadalcanal venture. Feeling that modern armies need an idea, an intellectual faith, Colonel Kernan provides one. Victory must see a return to Christian democracy, and his last paragraph advises us thus: "As we advance the colors against the new paganism, let us repeat the creed of the ancient Christendom [a period of democracy]: "Credo in unum Deum, Et in unum Dominum Jesum Christum. . . ." Alas, not all of our troops understand Latin.

COAL DUST ON THE FIDDLE. By George Korson. University of Pennsylvania Press. $3.50.

A collection of the ballads and stories of the soft-coal miner interspersed with a great deal of highly valuable material on the history of the industry. Mr. Korson knows his camps and mines; he visited scores of them from Nova Scotia, where the workers follow veins five miles out under the Atlantic, to Harlan, Coal Creek, and Ludlow. The songs themselves are not so interesting as the account Mr. Korson gives us of the daily life of the miner, his play and courtship, his folklore, his superstitions (when a woman visits a mine, disaster follows), his diseases, hazards, and tragedies. On these subjects he writes feelingly and with authority. Too few of the ballads are scored, but the book is otherwise carefully documented.

RECORDS

HAVING mentioned the idea of record company executives that record criticism should be written from the viewpoint of the large number of people with poor ears and poor machines, not from the viewpoint of the expert with good ears and a good machine, I should go on to say that a similar idea has grown up more generally in recent years about all writing on music. In the old days it was thought that an editor or publisher should publish the writing of a man who could give his readers the benefit of insight, judgment, and taste greater than theirs, making them aware of what they could not perceive themselves. But recently there has grown up the idea that the right man to talk about music to the ordinary person is the one with no more insight, judgment, or taste than the person he is writing for. That is the way some of the men who have begun to write music reviews and books recently have justified their writing, and I have noted that their judgment and taste were as undistinguished as they claimed, but that this did not make the writing profitable.

As for Beecham's difficulty in understanding the American record company mind, I have learned that only a very few artists have the clause in their contract that gives them the right to veto a recording they consider defective—the few being of course those who can compel the companies to give it to them. And I have been told that it was because Beecham did not have this clause in his contract that he got into his difficulty with Columbia and in the end had to give up his law-suit. It may be that he didn't have the clause in his contract with English Columbia either; if so it was probably because he didn't need it —because a company which produced those beautiful English recordings of his performances of Mozart and Delius and Tchaikovsky would not have wanted to issue a recording which he considered defective. After this he must have found it difficult to understand and deal with a company which, having produced a bad recording of Sibelius's Seventh, insisted on issuing it when he objected to it, and which continued to sell it and feature it in its advertising even after he had repudiated it publicly—to say nothing of the statement that he didn't know anything about recording.

From this we can see that it isn't only Beecham who is baffled by the American record company mind; the American record company executives are no less baffled and exasperated by attitudes like Beecham's. Years ago I accounted for the enormous superiority, at the time, of British broadcasting of music over American by the fact that in England broadcasting was run by men who because music meant a great deal to them could therefore understand and believe that it meant a great deal to others, whereas here broadcasting was run by business, advertising, and publicity men to whom music meant nothing and who therefore could not understand or believe that it meant anything to anyone else. So with recording: the men who run the business of recording in this country are utterly unable to understand what music means to someone like Beecham or Toscanini, how it sounds in his mind, how it must sound to his ear; and they are baffled when they produce a recording that will sell, and he objects to it or, if it is Toscanini, refuses to permit its sale, merely because the reproduced sound is muddy or badly balanced or mixed with noises from bad processing. That is why so few recordings of Toscanini's performances have come out recently; and though we have the means of preserving the performances of one of the most extraordinary musicians of all time, we may in the end be left with only a handful of recordings, and even some of these defective.

But if the record company mind is baffled and angered by these attitudes in a celebrated musician like Beecham or Toscanini, how can it understand similar attitudes in a mere music critic, who should be grateful for the expensive records he is sent gratis, and who instead complains that the reproduced sound is muddy or badly balanced or mixed with noises from bad processing?

I have recently received the latest of the letters that have arrived from time to time inquiring when Columbia was going to issue the new Beecham-London Philharmonic recording of Mozart's Symphony K. 338, about which there have been rumors for more than a year. But I would like to know myself; and I would like to know also what it is that causes both Victor and Columbia, when there is such a shortage of materials and labor, to waste them on some of the things they have been issuing instead of using them for some of the things they have not issued—what it is, for example, that has led Columbia to use them not for Beecham's recording of the Mozart Symphony but for Henry Cowell's "Tales of Our Countryside" (Set X-225, $2.50), about which nobody has written me inquiries. The music is not worth anyone's attention; it seems to be performed adequately, as far as I can judge, by Cowell with the All-American Orchestra under Stokowski; the recorded sound of the orchestra is unclear and unclean; the surfaces of my copy are noisy and defective.

Columbia's other July offering is Schumann's song-cycle "Frauenliebe und Leben" (Set 539, $3.50). The music is for the most part rather poor; but this is concealed by Lehmann's superb singing of it. On the other hand Bruno Walter, in his piano accompaniments, carries his sentimentalizing to the point where rhythm and phraseological contour are destroyed; and as it happens his postlude on the last side is made even worse on my copy by a terrific wavering in pitch. The recorded sound of Lehmann's voice is good; the surfaces of my copy are extremely noisy and defective.

The Eulenburg miniature scores are now being printed in England, and are being imported by the Edward B. Marks Music Corporation. The catalogue includes thus far the standard symphonies Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schubert, and Brahms, some of their concertos and chamber music, the Brandenburg Concertos of Bach, and a few unusual items like Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 453 and Violin Concerto K. 216, Wolf's Italian Serenade, Sibelius's Violin Concerto. Since they are printed in England I wondered about the paper, which is white and substantial; and I asked a musician who had had some experience with them how they stood up. He answered that the paper of his scores had got yellow and begun to disintegrate; but he reminded me that the Eulenburg scores had been printed on cheap paper even in Germany. It seems to me that the opportunity to get to know Mozart's Piano Concerto K.453 as one can by following the score while one listens to the records is worth the price of the score even if it begins to disintegrate after a couple of years.

y dear Mr. Mitchell: I have before e and read with interest an article ntitled Washington Gestapo written by XX. The editors of The Nation state their issue of July 17 that the author s deemed it necessary to guard his onymity with especial care. These litors vouchsafe the statements of the onymous writer.

I am asking you for your reaction to is article. The article outlines a series questions which, if actually presented that fashion, present a serious situa- on which warrants investigation. I, of urse, know nothing of the authenticity these charges.

To quote a few of these questions: How often does he read PM?" "Has ever criticized the Dies committee?" s it true that he reads The Nation and e New Republic?" "Does he talk a lot ainst the poll tax?" I personally uld be placed in any of these cate- ories. It is also charged that another question is, "Why do you suppose he has hired so many Jews?"

It is stated that the source book was "The Red Network" by Elizabeth Dilling, now under federal indictment on the charge of sedition.

I was most vigorous in my denunciation of the activities of the Dies committee and the Kerr committee with reference to the ouster of Watson, Lovett, etc. Unquestionably, there was a violation of the Constitution, as the bar sinister placed upon these men involves lynch law and bill of attainder. As I understand it, the only real charge in these cases was regarded as "subversive by association." . . .

Because one may be a friend of a friend who in turn is a friend of one who is actually subversive is no reason for placing a stigma on the first individual in the chain. This is a new method of indictment and punishment devised by reactionary groups.

Mind you, I do not accuse any of your investigators of these practices. I do not know the facts.

I ask you that you read this article and let me have your reaction as soon as your convenience may be served.

I mean to follow this matter up most closely.

Dear Sirs: I have just written to Senator Wagner calling his attention to Washington Gestapo and have asked him to investigate the conditions.

JULIAN LOEBENSTEIN

New York, July 19

It's a Lie

Dear Sirs: The article Washington Gestapo must be regarded by unprejudiced readers with a little suspicion. Civil Service and FBI investigators may be fascists, as your writer alleges, but they cannot be complete morons.

In America today an investigator does not say, "Does his face light up when the Red Army is mentioned?" "How often does he read PM?" "Is he always criticizing Vichy France?" "Did you ever hear him whistle the Communist Internationale?" People in America, in government service or out, simply do not speak like that. If your writer has met such an investigator he is a unique exception to be used as humorous relief in fiction and not in a serious article.

I do not believe that '"no government employee is safe from such an obscene attack on the elemental decencies." In fact, I can tell you that this is a damned lie; men returning from two and three years' service in Washington have never heard of FBI investigations in their departments. OTTO S. MAYER

. . . Last Refuge of a Scoundrel

Dear Sirs: Washington Gestapo confirms from a much larger experience than mine what has impressed me about investigators who have called on me for character references for men entering the armed services. This is a small community, with an unusual proportion of men who have sought commissions. I have been frankly amazed at the nature of the questions asked, both by the FBI directly and by credit-company men to whom they have turned over some names.

"Have you any reason to doubt his loyalty or patriotism?" begins the list. Any "radical" association is looked into. Any possible leaning toward "advanced ideas" is questioned. Some of the men, of the gentlest manners and address, have left me with the impression that they must have trained in a brokerage firm, and that the man they were willing to approve must be one of many generations of rock-ribbed Republicans of the New England variety. There is a hiatus between their questions, if not their thinking, and the fact that we are associated with the U. S. S. R. in a military way, in an effort to undermine the fascism in other countries, and this hiatus is reflected in their inquiries about candidates for commissions.

My mystification was made complete when this demand for a "character reference" about one man elicited from me the unasked-for information that while his patriotism was undoubted, he was irresponsible in two important regards, which I specified. "We are not interested in that so much, Doctor," was the reply. "We want to know only about his patriotism." So if the man is a scoundrel, is it all right? And what is the use of references?

MERRILL F. CLARKE

Who Killed Carlo Tresca?

Dear Sirs: Six months have passed since Carlo Tresca was murdered.

If the humblest of Tresca's thousands of comrades and fellow-workers for the advancement of human welfare as he saw it had been murdered in like manner, his murderers would long since have been apprehended and convicted through Tresca's efforts, because Tresca had the knowledge, the tireless energy, and the single devotion which we, his friends, woefully lack. The war, the general confusion and moral breakdown, his own multiplicity of interests would not have been permitted to interfere with his pursuit of the murderers. He would have pushed his way through closed doors, and cut his way through official barriers.

Many of his friends feel that the manner of his death was such as he himself not only expected but would have preferred. But he would wish that it be made immediately and surely a symbol and a banner for the carrying on of the fight as he saw it. Instead, the banner is muddied, bedraggled by uncertainty, confusion, and inertia. This is the great tragedy. Sacco, Vanzetti, Matteoti, even the Roselli brothers and Berneri—at least their murderers are known, if not officially acknowledged. Carlo Tresca's death will prove, I believe, to have had even greater significance in relation to the present world crisis than these others, and if the instigators of the murder could be revealed now, immediately, there might be some hope that the ensuing scandal would necessitate the cleaning up of some of the messier aspects of our European policy.

Let us hope that Tresca's friends and admirers may get together, organize a pressure group, hold mass-meetings, hammer at official doors, rouse the apathetic before it is too late—and a courageous, glowing, extraordinarily alive person doomed to die a double death.

Objection

Dear Sirs: I made a solemn resolve long ago that I would not write to the editor criticizing any review of my book, "Economic Freedom." But I cannot resist quoting the following sentence from the review by Abba P. Lerner which appeared in your issue of July 3:

> A related confusion appears when private enterprise is simultaneously accused of (a) too little investment out of tenderness for the capital values, belonging to the same corporation, that would be destroyed by the new investment, and (b) too much investment because of lack of concern for the capital values of other corporations, in the preservation of which capital values, it is wrongly claimed, society has a vested interest.

> Society as a whole has a vested interest in every existing plant at least to the extent of the labor and materials which have gone into it, and there is no sense building a new plant unless it is so much better than the one it replaces that the ultimate saving justifies scrapping what has already been built. A paradox of the present situation is that while old plants and processes are too often allowed to outlive their economic usefulness, valuable machines and skills are frequently forced into the discard by changes which have no real economic justification.

I don't get it. Who's confused?

The reviewer also says, "Perhaps it was a little unfair to give this book to an economist to review." In the preface I wrote, "I have therefore written this book as an attempt to face economic problems in terms of political reality."

The review does not even mention the political problems to which the book was almost solely directed.

The Same Line

Dear Sirs: Shortly before the Nazi invasion of Denmark and Norway an avalanche of propaganda descended on Scandinavia. The Nazis told the Nordic nations that England wanted to involve them in the war and that the neutrality and independence of Northern Europe were threatened. At that very time the Nazi prison ship Altmark lay in Norwegian waters, and the invasion boats were ready to start.

After the invasion of Denmark and Norway, and after the Nazi divisions had established themselves permanently in Finland, Quisling's own newspaper, Fritt Folk (Free People), declared that England was now threatening Sweden and trying to drag it into the war. The same tune is still being played in the Deutsche Zeitung in Norwegen, the newspaper of the German occupation forces. This is Goebbels's and Ribbentrop's official propaganda line; the free Norwegians and the Free Danes are only too familiar with it.

To my vast astonishment I recentl discovered this same line in an American newspaper. It was not written b Quisling, not published in a Germa newspaper; it originated in our ver midst. I quote:

> The British are attempting to dislodge Sweden from her position of neutrality. Bu Sweden hesitates. Every nation that has aide Britain has been precipitated into the war. Take a lesson from the Irish. They've remained neutral and are at peace with the world. They're neither pro-German nor pro-British. They're pro-Irish. They have an "Irish First" policy.

This appeared in the May issue of an ostensibly religious newspaper, Bibl News Flashes, published in Minneapolis.

Nazi propaganda is daily hammerin away at Sweden that "England want to get you into the war." Nazi propaganda supported the isolationist Irelan First and America First policies. Bibl News Flashes is edited by the Reverend W. D. Herrstrom, a Swedish-American.

In the same issue Herrstrom wrot of the Jewish problem:

> Rabbi Wise wants to bring 2,000,00 Jews from Central Europe to the Unite States. Why not send them right next doo into Soviet Russia. All the Jews I know i this country (except a few genuinely converted Christian Jews) are in favor of th Communist regime. In fact, too many o them seem to think it is superior to ou American system of free enterprise an Christian liberty. Asiatics usually fit into a Asiatic or Eurasian regime much better tha they fit into our American system. After all it's next to impossible to ever make Americans adopt Asiatic ideas or Asiatic busine methods.

It seems to me that I have heard thi tone before—in every issue of Juliu Streicher's Der Stürmer.

Reverend Herrstrom grieved fo Father Coughlin and lamented the indictment of thirty-three pro-fascists i Washington.

The Shape of Things

ON THREE FRONTS THE AIR IS PREGNANT with decisions that will determine the length of the war and go far toward setting the pattern of the peace. Rome, Orel, and Algiers are the key spots. By the time this issue reaches you the Badoglio government may have surrendered to General Eisenhower—in which case we shall know how far the United Nations are prepared to support postwar reactionary regimes with Allied bayonets—or all Italy may already be in the throes of full-fledged social revolution. The Italian crisis is discussed fully elsewhere in these pages. At Orel the German army braces itself for a last-ditch defense with a grimness that testifies to the desperate importance of stemming the Russian offensive. Let the Red forces smash through at Orel, driving between the central and southern Nazi armies, and the Germans will face a military disaster that will put Stalingrad in the shade. What this would do to a German morale already rocking under the blows of Mussolini's collapse, the inevitable loss of the Sicilian campaign, and the harrowing destruction of Hamburg, is not hard to imagine. Even the Franco press in Spain is already talking about "the 1918 phase of the war."

IN ALGIERS, TO COMPLETE THE PICTURE, Generals De Gaulle and Giraud have finally worked out the long-awaited compromise by which the armed forces of the two leaders are at last to be united. The solution of this thorny problem distinctly favors De Gaulle, who not only will act as chief executive in all civilian and political matters but who is slated to head the newly created Committee of National Defense. General Giraud, Commander in Chief of all French forces, will be ultimately responsible to this committee, though he will retain his co-chairmanship of the over-all Committee of National Liberation. Having surmounted its severest crisis, this last-named agency again confronts the United Nations with the demand that it be recognized as the official "trustee" of the French nation. No longer is it possible to point to the De Gaulle-Giraud division as a pretext for denying such recognition. On a quick decision to yield gracefully hangs the future effectiveness of our political warfare.

THE LONDON TIMES PROBABLY EXPRESSED the concern of the British Foreign Office when it criticized the Russian government for launching a "Free German Committee" without consulting its allies. Certainly such action is unfortunate. The future of Europe should not be determined in Moscow any more than in London or Washington. But what the move reveals is something much more serious than recalcitrance on the part of Russia. It reveals, and dramatizes, the disastrous lack of a common political strategy for the war and a common political program for post-war Europe. Russia's interests demand an early end to the struggle and the creation of a stable democratic set-up in Central Europe. These aims exactly coincide with the proclaimed desires of Britain and America. But the western allies have so far shown no practical interest in democratic set-ups anywhere in Europe. They have found strategic reasons for supporting Franco in Spain, Pétain in France, and the reactionary relicts of Vichy in North Africa. They seem to be following a similarly equivocal course in Italy. If Moscow has been kept informed of British-American moves in Sicily, as the Times asserts, it was certainly not consulted on French policy, which it has openly disapproved. Stalin may have to swallow reaction in Western Europe. He will not permit it in the countries along Russia's endless frontier. Developments in the west undoubtedly precipitated his move in the east. Lacking any common policy, the creation of the German committee is a logical effort to stimulate revolt now and lay the foundations for a friendly Germany after the war. Only an honest application of the democratic pledges of the Allied leaders will prevent the sort of unilateral action the Times so earnestly deplores.

WHATEVER THE TERMS OF HIRE, IT IS PRETTY clear that the deal by which the Axis obtained the broadcasting services of eight Americans was a bad bargain for both sides. Indictments handed up in Washington last week confront the octet with the choice of putting bullets through their respective heads now or running the risk of eventually hanging for treason. On the other hand, the Berlin propaganda office certainly saddled itself with as mediocre a collection of misfits as it would be possible to find in the country's subversive circles: a broken-down bit actor, a would-be correspondent who never achieved a higher rating than "string man," a stock broker wiped out in the 1929 crash, two German-American school teachers whose German-Americanism at no time differed from that of Fritz Kuhn's Bund, a woman whose journalistic career culminated on the WPA Writers' Project and who frankly needed cash, and a professional Mata Hari whose life was spared by the Spanish Loyalists only through the intervention of the American State Department. As short-wave propagandists for Dr. Goebbels, all were failures, and most of them have been off the air for some time. Few Americans ever heard them, and those who did must have been impressed with the frenzied and irrational quality of their product, as well as the ponderous Teutonic touch of their programs. In Ezra Pound the Italians drew the only American of consequence in the collection. But even here the propaganda value was low. A violent anti-democrat and by choice an exile from his hated country, Pound has no following here. For all their ineffectiveness, however, these eight warped individuals clearly did their best to aid the enemy. If they failed, so did the eight saboteurs to whom we gave short shrift last summer.

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT IS, AMONG other things, President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces of a nation engaged in a world war. But to Harrison Spangler, chairman of the Republican National Committee, these jobs are subsidiary in Roosevelt's view to his position as head of the Democratic Party and important to him only in so far as he can use them to advance his candidacy for a fourth term. Mr. Spangler, with the courage of his obsession, has therefore asked Secretary Stimson, Secretary Knox, and Robert Sherwood, of the OWI, to transmit to American armed forces all over the world the Republican charge that the President's speech—it is discussed on another page—and particularly his post-war program for returning soldiers, was primarily a bid for a fourth term. Otherwise, Mr. Spangler sees our free institutions imperiled and "our boys and girls" reduced to "political serfs." A Washington comment suggests that what really makes Mr. Spangler and his friends angry is that the President "grabbed a political issue from under their noses." The stay-at-home Republicans, as opposed to those like Wendell Willkie who have seen the world, are willing to let Roosevelt run the "international" war if they can count on running the domestic post-war. It's an old Republican game; no wonder the Spanglers and the Landons are annoyed when Roosevelt refuses to observe the rules. Still it seems hardly worth while cluttering army newspapers and ship's bulletins with their attack on the President for his mild pledge of post-war security. Everyone, armed and unarmed, knows by now that if Roosevelt so much as pats the head of his dog Fala he is, in the opinion of the Spangler Republicans, aiming at the nomination in 1944.

VICE-PRESIDENT WALLACE MAY BECOME THE stepchild of the Roosevelt Administration, but for millions of workers and small farmers his Detroit speech was still the authentic voice of the New Deal. Judging from reactions to that speech, one of Wallace's best, he is to serve a dual role politically. On the one hand, he is to help keep labor lined up for Roosevelt. On the other, he is to be a kind of lightning rod to draw off right-wing criticism from the President himself. For labor, the renomination of Wallace in 1944 becomes a prime consideration, a test of labor's strength and some guaranty that the Administration will not go all the way on the path of appeasement. That Senator Guffey, who rarely makes important pronouncements without White House approval, should have gone on record for Wallace as Vice-Presidential nominee in 1944 may be significant. It may indicate, as did the President's praise of the speech, that Wallace can have his place on the ticket if he can stir up enough political support by the time of the convention. The slurs of the conservative press attest the fact that the Detroit speech drew blood. What we liked most about it was that in Detroit, scene of the recent anti-Negro outbreaks, the Vice-President pulled no punches on the race issue. "We cannot fight to crush Nazi brutality abroad," Mr. Wallace declared, "and condone race riots at home."

THE FAULTS ATTRIBUTED TO OPA RENT regulation by the special House committee investigating executive agencies are probably responsible for the success with which that same committee credits the OPA. The committee praises the OPA for doing an effective job but criticizes it for adopting rules which conflict with state law, interfering with contracts and leases signed before the Federal Rent Control Law went into effect, and setting aside state and local eviction laws. It is hard to see how the OPA could possibly have done a good job of rent regulation without overriding a tangled mass of state and local legislation enacted for normal times. The committee which made the investigation was headed by Representative Howard W. Smith of Virginia, and it was expected to discredit New Deal agencies. That it had no harsher criticism to offer of the OPA is an unexpected and impressive compliment to the OPA's success in an area where regulation is extremely difficult.

THE PRESIDENT'S REORGANIZED COMMITTEE on Fair Employment Practices seems to be getting off to a good start under its chairman, Monsignor Francis J. Haas of Catholic University. It has ordered the reinstatement of 300 Negro workers in West Coast shipyards discharged under a closed-shop agreement when they refused to pay dues to a separate "auxiliary" union set up for them by the American Federation of Labor boilermakers' union .The committee must decide whether establishment of a separate union based on color, race, or creed constitutes discrimination. We ceratinly think it does, and the committee cannot hold otherwise without losing public confidence. The new committee has also voted to enforce the old FEPC order to the Capital Transit Company in Washington. Capital Transit still refuses to hire Negro help, although many transit companies in Southern cities do so. Nothing has caused more bitterness among Negroes in the capital than this refusal to permit them, in the midst of a great man-power shortage, to enjoy the privilege—for such it seems to be considered—of driving a bus.

How to Use a Revolution

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THE current flows with formidable speed. Hardly twenty-four hours after the downfall of Mussolini, the very elements which had eliminated him from the political scene were themselves on the edge of disaster. The first cries of joy which greeted Victor Emmanuel were not so much a "Long Live the King" as "Death to Mussolini," and as soon as Mussolini was out of the way popular conscience turned against those who had shared his rule and the responsibility for his crimes. The demand for a new political order blended with the cries of the Italian crowds for peace.

Those crowds had been waiting, much more alive than some people thought or desired. For those who have believed in the existence of the people of Europe and who have given more importance to their reactions than to the intrigues of appeasers in London and Washington, the strength which the Italian crowds, supported in some places by the army, have manifested in Milan and other cities has not been a surprise. Our anti-Fascist Italian friends have been right all along in insisting that the people of Italy were not only against the war but also, and primarily, against the regime. Nor was their antagonism just a vague emotion. They have succeeded in organizing, despite Fascist terror and Gestapo vigilance. The underground has existed even though the people who conduct the war for the United Nations have evidenced not the slightest inclination to aid in its development. Without the presence of an illegal movement many of the political events we are witnessing in Italy would never have occurred.

Once more, sharper and clearer than ever before, a line is drawn between those who consider this war a war against fascism and those who consider it a war to destroy the group of powers responsible for aggression. Even in the speeches of Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt the happenings in Italy were treated with more concern for military than political considerations. If, in the last year, Churchill had felt the same hatred against fascism as a system of terror as he felt against the German desire for world domination, his speech would have been different. His incomparable eloquence would have given him words to mark forever the downfall of the first pillar of Fascist power. But he has never felt both things with equal force. Even in the midst of the war he limited the political problem of Italy to the elimination of "one man."

No one forgets that we are at war. No one denies that our first problem is to win the war. But it is quite possible to harmonize the demands of military strategy with the principles for which we are officially fighting. Indeed, according to our concept, to handle intelligently this major political defeat of the Axis is to help win the war. To take full advantage of the collapse of Italian fascism, to galvanize the peoples of Europe into action on our side is even from the military point of view a move of first importance. Ordinary Europeans, suffering under a combination of war and tyranny, must think sometimes that in the higher spheres of the United Nations are men who don't know what they want. Constantly the people are asked by Allied leaders to rebel against their Nazi and Fascist oppressors. But when the hour for revolt strikes, they find those same leaders busy offering terms to the men they have learned to hate and distrust, while they, the people, are urged to keep order at all costs.

When Mr. Churchill complains in his speech that the totalitarian system has left the broad masses "without any influence upon their country's destinies and without any independent figures apart from the official classes," he is profoundly unfair to the anti-Fascist elements, especially outside Italy, who have kept the confidence of the Italian people. In his statement to the New York Times of July 30 Count Sforza, proposing an immediate drive led by "pure Italians" who have never compromised with fascism, attacks the problem at its root. He does not limit himself to proposals that Italy be taken out of the present world struggle and left as a lost island in the midst of the gigantic ideological conflict. He asserts that if a government "morally respected by all were to put the rich accomplices of fascism on trial immediately, seriously promise generous agrarian reforms, and impose complete tranquillity on the country, it would obtain public support for a proclamation of war against Nazism." This conception is absolutely correct. Furthermore, he warns, "Allied public opinion could make no worse mistake than showing itself afraid of the so-called danger of revolution. This fear was the best ally of Hitler and Mussolini during the many years of Chamberlain blindness. It might be fatal to repeat it now."

Sforza and his militant anti-Fascist supporters, in and out of Italy, have a policy that would have made it unnecessary to improvise political solutions during these recent days. It is not true that the only immediate alternatives to Mussolini are the King and Badoglio, and that therefore, for the sake of expediency, the United Nations are obliged to deal with them. What is true is that the United Nations were not politically prepared for any democratic action in Italy. In spite of official denials, it is hard to imagine that with the Germans in the country and the Fascist Party still in power, the King and Badoglio, on Sunday, July 25, would have had the courage to oust Mussolini if there had not been certain conversations between them and the Allied governments. Negotiations had undoubtedly been going on, but the people who were not approached and whose efforts were not utilized were the real democratic elements of Italy.

It is late, but there is still time for action. Count Sforza asks for action by "pure Italians." His demand should be met immediately. If it is not, the Italian case will furnish definite proof that the only policy of the western allies in regard to Europe is Darlanism, military expediency, even to the point of betraying democracy.

History Unrecognized

ON THIS side of the Atlantic interest in the collapse of fascismo has centered strangely on an inept broadcast which was quickly and officially damned for the wrong reasons. In a perfectly understandable zeal to head off another Darlan episode, the Office of War Information rushed to the microphone to tell the world that the overthrow of Mussolini "changes nothing," that "while the news of Mussolini's resignation is welcome to Americans, it is not regarded here as an event of great importance."

Here was a misreading of history in the grand manner. It should have been possible for the OWI to belittle the anti-Fascist pretensions of King Victor Emmanuel and Marshal Badoglio without at the same time belittling the greatest political event of the war to date. How else are we to describe a development which in one week brought in its train the liquidation of the Fascist Party with all its trappings, the flight, arrest, suicide, or assassination of many of its leaders, the joyous emergence of Italy's underground into the streets of its cities, panicky consultations in every satellite capital, and gloomy foreboding in the Third Reich? Clearly the OWI let slip an occasion for swamping the enemy with a propaganda barrage of heroic proportions.

But if the OWI missed the bus, what are we to say of the President's rebuke? The OWI was taken to task not for its failure to herald to the conquered peoples the beginning of the end of fascism, but because it called Victor Emmanuel "the moronic little king" and Badoglio "a high-ranking Fascist." Since when have epithets directed at our enemies called for Presidential censure? Or has the disappearance of Mussolini by some subtle chemistry already converted the House of Savoy from enemy to friend? Looking toward the day when we invite the unconditional surrender of Japan, are we to grow month by month more respectful of Hirohito?

These are questions which the President's speech left disappointingly unanswered. We were delighted to hear him repeat the pledge that "we will have no truck with fascism in any way, in any shape or manner," but if the men who invited fascism to take power are not to be regarded as Fascists, nor those who shored it up, led its wars, utilized its techniques, and accepted its rewards, what does the President mean when he promises that "we will permit no vestige of fascism to remain"?

Of course the public spanking suffered by the OWI was grist to the mill of the State Department's doughty champions in the correspondents' corps. Most brazen performance of the week was Arthur Krock's "straight" news story in the New York Times which cited "the high official view" that the New York short-wave department of the OWI "deliberately and constantly borrows" from "journalistic sources—otherwise undistinguished—which have opposed the President's Vichy and North African policies," and that it does so in order "to discredit the authorized foreign policy of the United States government, or to reshape it according to the personal and ideological preference of Communists and their fellow-travelers in this country." All of which merely shows that Mr. Krock's layer of unctuousness has worn thin; he can be crude as well as misleading.

Like the OWI, the President too seems to have lost his sense of history. The downfall of Mussolini was the occasion for a great speech, a speech that would put before the world the picture of fascism as the futile crime it is, as a movement which in twenty-two years so far failed to impress its charms on the public mind that with the slightest lifting of the lid the country seethes and Fascist leaders who can't scurry fast enough are hanged in the public square.

The President didn't go into these matters, and in consequence his message to the people seemed curiously flat for the occasion. His failure to clarify the government's attitude toward the King and Badoglio, his rebuke of the OWI, and General Eisenhower's tribute to the House of Savoy have already provoked the beginning of what Mr. Krock fearfully calls "a repetition of the American backfire on Darlan and Giraud." This time, thanks to the warning afforded by the North African experience, the backfire may be loud enough and timely enough to forestall a tragic blunder.

F. D. R. on the Defensive

ON DOMESTIC issues as on foreign policy the President's radio broadcast was uninspired and uninspiring. It reflected a defensive and compromising spirit, and we take what comfort we can from the fact that the President does not seem his usual self when forced into these attitudes. We enjoy the President most, and he seems to like himself best, when he can take the offensive on social issues and chart a bold course. In this present mood he has succeeded in charming the conservative press, but we doubt whether he will thrill common men in or out of the armed services as he has in the past.

The President's explanation of the need for rationing comes several months too late. We wish he had made it earlier. He has a great capacity for leadership, and there would be a good deal less confusion on the home front if he could take time to explain more of these complicated issues to the people. No one else can do it with the same authority. Unfortunately even here he was on the defensive, calling for sacrifice while announcing the end of coffee rationing. There was little indication that the President is prepared to take the offensive on the inflation front and roll back the price of foodstuffs on a wide scale. Nothing could make him more popular, but if he doesn't act soon Congress will be back in session and it may be too late.

We note with interest the President's new program of aid to soldiers in demobilization, and we approve the measures he outlines. He offers mustering-out pay, unemployment insurance if no job can be found, an opportunity for further education at public expense, credit to all members of the armed services for social-security payments during the period in uniform, better hospitalization, rehabilitation, and medical care, and "sufficient pensions." This is no more than justice demands, and it is good political medicine for the New Deal.

"I have assured our men in the armed forces," the President said, "that the American people would not let them down when the war is won." That is an important pledge. But we hope the President will not succumb, in a period of reaction and retreat, to the view that mustering-out pay and other palliatives amply fulfil that pledge. The real promise on which the men in the services and the folks at home depend is full employment for everyone. That way alone lies protection for the Four Freedoms.

The President says he has plans ready for the new Congress. We hope those plans look toward the implementation of that broader promise. But it will take more willingness to fight reaction within and without the Democratic Party than the President has shown in recent months. Perhaps the key question here is what will be done with the vastly expanding production facilities now owned by the government. If these are turned to peacetime use, whether under public or private ownership, the resultant fall in prices and production costs, the enlarged employment opportunities, and the additional real wealth will be sufficient to insure against a new depression. But if the President permits Jesse Jones to dispose of them to monopoly for dismantling, as seems likely at the moment, we shall return to a regime of scarcity. Full employment will become another blasted hope on which post-war fascist demagogues will thrive.

How Washington Reacted

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 29

WASHINGTON'S reaction to the fall of Mussolini was curiously apathetic. Secretary Hull appeared nervous lest he say the wrong thing at Monday's press conference, and afterward the press attachés even asked me—and I am not the most popular of correspondents at the State Department—how I liked the conference. There was an unusually large turnout to hear what the Secretary of State of the world's foremost democratic power would have to say of the fall of the world's first Fascist dictator. Perhaps the most significant observation that can be made on the conference is that Hull seemed ill at ease.

Kingsbury Smith, the Hearst I. N. S. correspondent, who looks like an Italian count but is said to hail from Missouri, took his accustomed place in the front row and opened with the prescribed question: Did the Secretary of State care to make any comments on developments in Italy? Secretary Hull replied that he had long been convinced that fascism carries within it the seeds of its own destruction. The very timely and appropriate ending of Mussolini, he thought—direct quotation is permitted only by special permission and on special occasions—was the first major step in the early and complete destruction and eradication of every vestige of fascism, both nationally and internationally.

If any unusual activity is going on in the State Department as a result of the fall of Mussolini, it is being kept well hidden from the press. There is a Mr. Jones in charge of the Italian "desk" who reports to a new acting chief of the European division whose name I have mislaid. This new chief in turn is subordinate to James Clement Dunn, the department's political adviser for Western Europe and leader of the pro-Franco faction during the Spanish war and since. Over Dunn is Assistant Secretary Breckinridge Long, once our ambassador to Rome and an admirer of Mussolini. Attempts to talk with these officials were courteously discouraged.

In its feuds with newer agencies of the government the State Department insists that it should determine all questions of foreign policy. But when questions of foreign policy are put to it, correspondents are referred to the White House or the War Department or told to keep their minds on the war. Monday's press conference was typical. Secretary Hull was asked whether the government considers the House of Savoy a faction or a former faction of the Fascist authorities. This question—not asked by this correspondent—seemed to all of us a political question and one properly asked of the Secretary of State. Hull's answer was that he didn't know the attitude of the military and naval branches of the government on that question. Naturally, the Secretary continued, the war being still in progress in Italy, so far as the State Department is concerned, it simply had not come to that question. I report that reply as exactly as the rule against quotation marks permits. Is the State Department marking time until the war is over?

This same question seems to have bothered others. Harold Callender of the New York Times asked whether there was a danger that victory might come before we were prepared in a diplomatic and political sense. Hull's answer to this was, "Sufficient unto the day. . . ." He looked pleased with himself, as he did at his answer to the next question. Mr. Secretary, he was asked, what is our government doing, if anything, as a result of the developments in Rome yesterday? The answer was—permission to quote directly was later granted—"They are fighting like the devil." Keep your mind on that, Hull added, and we will win the war sooner.

Hull held on to the chair in front of him, blinked his eyes as though the light was too strong for them, occasionally lifted them to look at whatever correspondent asked a question, and spoke in a low, monotonous voice those present found it difficult to hear. (I checked all this with the transcript afterward.) He has a slight speech defect, almost a lisp. Unlike some old men, there is no youth in his eyes, and the fall of Mussolini does not seem to have affected his blood pressure. He said that there was no truth in reports that we had made contact with Badoglio, and that he had heard of no contact with the Vatican in connection with the change in the Italian government. When asked whether unconditional surrender applied also to other Axis allies—Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria—he referred the question to the War Department but ventured that the question would certainly be raised against any and all countries that have declared war at any time against the United States. When asked whether that applied to Finland, Hull said Finland was a marginal case. How the State Department loves little Finland!

Correspondents had to keep reminding themselves that the fall of Mussolini was an event. The President at his press conference Tuesday was casual, and when asked his reaction to the resignation of Il Duce, said he never had any reactions and that he was too old to have them. Since Mr. Roosevelt is one of those men who never really grow up—I mean this as a compliment—it seemed odd that the fall of fascism should leave him in so senescent a mood. He showed emotion only in denouncing the Sunday-night short-wave broadcast in which the OWI called Badoglio a "high-ranking Fascist" and quoted Samuel Grafton's characterization of Victor Emmanuel as "the moronic little king." I think it cause for disquiet that the warmest Administration reaction to the fall of Mussolini was an attack by the President on a distinguished anti-fascist columnist for the pro-New Deal New York Post.

The Administration is making some strange friends these days. Last Monday Cissie Patterson's editor, Frank Waldrop, took this correspondent to task for criticizing the President so severely last week. The Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press and Arthur Krock warmed up to the attack on the OWI and Grafton. Krock accused Grafton of following an "'ideology' that conforms much more closely to the Moscow than to the Washington-London line," although, as Victor Bernstein pointed out in PM, the Times the day before had editorially taken much the same line as Grafton toward the Badoglio government, calling it a "military dictatorship" trying by martial law "to protect the Fascist gangsters."

The whole affair has pleased the State Department greatly, for it has put the President in the position of fighting those who have been consistently critical of State Department policy. I am inclined to believe that we have been wrong to characterize it as State Department policy. "Off the record" information I am not privileged to reveal at this time leads me to conclude that the whole North African and French policies are the President's as much as the State Department's, if not more so. While there is a strong faction in the State Department which favors recognition of the French National Committee, as does the British government, the President is said to be strongly opposed. Incredible though it sounds, informed people whom I trust say that one reason for this is that the President still thinks another deal with Pétain may yet be possible and is prepared even to make a deal with Laval, if anything can be obtained from him.

French policy is made more, not less, important by Italian developments. For our military strategy would seem to call but for the encirclement of Italy. The idea would be to strike across southern Italy and northward into the Balkans with one arm of the offensive, while the other moves up through Sardinia and Corsica to Marseilles and up the Rhone Valley to Alsace. Since these are the obvious avenues of assault, I am revealing geography, not military secrets. The French underground should play an important part in that program, but from all indications the Administration seems unwilling to collaborate with popular forces. The ultra-conservative New York Sun in an editorial yesterday bluntly expressed what many officials here would be afraid to say publicly but are none the less acting on privately. The Sun said that what American and England were concerned with at the moment was "the prevention of anarchy in Italy," which I take to be a synonym for social revolution. The Sun found it "unpleasant to reflect" that the French National Committee "may have given undue weight to the unfortunate phrase that we are fighting to liberate the occupied countries."

Franklin D. Roosevelt is heading straight for a situation which may some day make the Four Freedoms seem as much a mockery to the common people of the world as the Fourteen Points. At home the State Department has obtained greater control of both economic warfare and the Lehman relief organization. Both can be used to give support to a Badoglio government, if it lasts long enough for that. The significance of the Grafton incident is that the President's attitude is giving the State Department the control it has long sought over the OWI's foreign broadcasts. Incidentally, Mayor LaGuardia should also be rebuked by the President, for he too warned the Italian people Sunday night not to be deceived by the substitution of Badoglio for Mussolini.

The situation abroad parallels the situation at home. The London New Statesman and Nation last week protested against the appointment of Lord Rennell of Rodd as chief civilian aide to General Sir Harold Alexander in charge of Amgot. Lord Rennell was criticized as a financier, a member of the Oxford group, and a former friend of Volpi. He was general manager, so I am informed, of the Bank of International Settlements—that stratospheric refuge of high finance above the clamor of an anti-fascist struggle—and was a partner in Morgan, Grenfell, the London affiliate of J. P. Morgan and Company. Morgan loans and the Vatican blessing were two of the principal supports of the Fascist regime. Given Lord Rennell at the top and the use of Fascist officials at the bottom, Amgot would seem an ideal vehicle for restoring exactly the kind of Italy which bred fascism.

Amgot's sway, according to present plans here, is to be extended over all of occupied Europe. The Nazi radio in France is already making use of this to dispirit the underground. I am beginning to feel that while we are ready to make deals with any of the crooks at the top except the full-fledged, fully labeled Nazis and Fascists, we are out to demand "unconditional surrender" of the peoples of Europe to what must begin to seem to them Anglo-American imperialism. The Europe that Amgot would restore is not a Europe in which the Four Freedoms could be achieved. The most dangerous development of all is that while Amgot was launched without consulting Moscow, Moscow has since launched a National Committee for a Free Germany without consulting London and Washington. If the present drift is allowed to continue, and without strong public pressure it will, Moscow will be supporting democratic regimes while we sponsor a revival of monarchy and reaction. That way, plain for all to see, lies World War III.

Lend-Lease Works Both Ways

BY ALAN BARTH

THE American Expeditionary Force is an expensive house guest. For over a year the British have been entertaining a substantial and steadily growing contingent. So have the Australians and the New Zealanders. If United States troops abroad had to be fed and equipped entirely from their home bases, our shipping problem would be genuinely insuperable. Fortunately, in large part they live off the land where they are stationed. Much of their subsistence and many of their weapons are provided gratis by their hosts. This is an aspect of the lend-lease program which is never mentioned by American politicians when they attack the Administration for so lavishly distributing the nation's treasure.

In the last war we supplied our overseas army by purchasing its requirements from our allies for cash. In this war the procedure is simply to state that a need exists; our allies meet it as best they can by lend-leasing supplies to us. "The principle of mutual aid," this was termed at a recent Congressional hearing by the Lend-Lease Administrator, Edward R. Stettinius, Jr. "In all parts of the world," observed Mr. Stettinius, "—the United Kingdom, Russia, Australia, China, New Zealand, New Caledonia, Fiji, Iceland, India, the Belgian Congo, North Africa, British East and South Africa, Iran, Iraq, Syria, the Caribbean—American military and naval forces and our merchant marine have received every type of available commodity or service which could satisfy their needs. While the flow of lend-lease goods going abroad has steadily increased, reciprocal benefits from our allies, also granted without payment, have grown steadily."

A catalogue of these reciprocal benefits would be instructive. It would afford a view of the complexity of the task of provisioning an expeditionary force. Our air forces in England, for example, have received from the British meteorological equipment, hangars, defrosting and de-icing devices, parachutes, tires, and protective armor—not to speak of 675 planes and numerous landing fields. On the eve of the invasion of North Africa in November it was discovered almost at the last minute that the radio equipment on our planes, which worked well enough in England, was not suited to African conditions. The R. A. F. at once stripped its own ships of radio transmitting and receiving sets and installed them in American fighters and bombers. This meant, for a time at least, that many British pilots were flying the Channel without benefit of radio. The ruling consideration was strategic need. Since weapons have been largely internationalized, the same consideration has influenced allotments on every front. The principle of mutual aid has been welding the heterogeneous forces of the United Nations into a genuine global army.

Our engineer corps in England has been furnished aerodrome construction materials, locomotives, rails, road-building and repair equipment, and most of the tools and supplies needed in its work—asphalt, lumber, pile drivers, wire, cement, coal. Our Quartermaster Corps has received clothing and blankets, bakeries and laundries, desks and office space, warehouses, furniture, recreational equipment. The Transportation Corps has been given various types of harbor, assault, and combat boats. The Signal Corps has been supplied with telephones, batteries, cable, radios, transformers, and photographic materials.

But these items, plucked more or less at random from lend-lease files, constitute only a portion of the aid given American forces abroad. From 12,000 to 25,000 British civilians, paid by the British government, serve our army directly. The British have turned over to us and are maintaining thirteen completely equipped hotels, with their staffs, as residences for our officers. In the Middle East the British have supplied American forces with local currency with which to purchase material and labor; they did this not because of any specific commitment but simply because when our troops went into the area, the British were better able to obtain the currency than we. Our initial landing force in North Africa received from the British more than 3,800 tons of ammunition, enough artillery for an entire division, some 80,000 tons of coal, 2,000 tons of British rations, medical maintenance units for hundreds of thousands of men, and about 30,000 tons of engineering equipment. Consider what this meant to our greatly overtaxed shipping facilities.

Other countries which are recipients of American lend-lease aid have displayed equal readiness to reciprocate. During 1942 Australia supplied American forces in the South and Southwest Pacific with the bulk of the foodstuffs they required on a ration scale comparable to the basic allowance of the American army. This meant that for a number of months civilians in the continent down under went without potatoes, citrus fruits, pork products, and other staples of their diet. New Zealand, a land of fewer than 2,000,000 people, contributed to our forces quartered there all kinds of foodstuffs and sizable quantities of clothing. Even the Fiji Islanders have done their part, providing our men with more than $5,500 worth of ice cream.

The Lend-Lease Administration keeps a master set of books on the goods given to and received from our allies. But values are not reckoned entirely in dollars for the simple reason that this would be an impossible accounting job. The Army Engineer Corps once estimated that if we attempted to keep running accounts in dollars for everything received by the American forces in England, half a division of men would be required for the purpose. And of course many of the dollar valuations would be arbitrary and virtually meaningless. Indeed, any attempt to evaluate lend-lease on a strictly monetary basis is to miss its significance altogether. For what counts in war is use value, not money value.

On what basis, for example, could we calculate the value of British airfields, barracks, and other facilities constructed for the use of American forces? These have cost the British government more than $600,000,000, not counting the value of the land. But no one knows how long we shall use them. We can, if we like, enter ordinary gasoline on the books at the current market price. But who can tell the worth of high-octane gas? It has no market save for war purposes.

Even the dollar valuation of our own lend-lease shipments is largely fictional. In his last report on the subject the President declared that up to April 30, 1943, the value of our lend-lease aid to our allies totaled $11,102,000,000. But the figure represents merely a cost price in a controlled market. It may be conjectured, indeed, that the dollar valuation is made public precisely because it is meaningless and can therefore give no information to the enemy. When, in a time of desperate urgency, we transferred fifty destroyers to Great Britain, we reckoned their price not in dollars but in terms of leases of certain air and naval bases in the Atlantic.

By taking the budgetary appropriations for lend-lease purposes, it is possible to estimate roughly the per capita costs of lend-lease to some of the United Nations—a far more equitable basis for comparison than overall figures on expenditures. But in view of the wide differences that exist in costs of production, the figures should be regarded as only crude approximations of the actual contributions to the lend-lease pool. American lend-lease expenditures for the year 1942, excluding "services," were $35.49 per capita, or at the rate of about $2.96 a month. In January of this year they were $3.80 per capita and by March had gone up to $5.41. Australia's budget estimate for aid to us works out to $24.80 per capita for the year ending June, 1943—$2.07 a month. In January expenditures were $2.43 per capita. Canada is making a per capita contribution of $79.69 yearly, or $6.64 monthly. New Zealand's share amounts to approximately $3.30 per capita a month. So large a portion of British aid to Russia and to the United States is in the form of incalculable benefits and services that no dollar evaluation can be attempted.

It is important to remember that a nation's ability to contribute to mutual aid depends on two factors: (1) the degree of its industrial development and its wealth in natural resources; (2) the extent to which it is actually fighting the enemy. The contributions of Russia and China do not loom large on the books of lend-lease; their share in the United Nations effort is written in blood. The United States, on the other hand, with its enormous industrial capacity and its comparative immunity from the ravages of war, will have an outstanding, though by no means unrivaled, claim to the title "arsenal of democracy." Each of the United Nations will have given in accordance with its ability.

When the time comes for balancing the books, it would seem elementary common sense to rule out of consideration all the goods consumed in warfare. It does not much matter whether the bombs and bullets turned out by American factories were in Russian, British, Chinese, or American hands so long as they were used effectively. If we gave our allies more of these than we received from them, it may indicate merely that they were on the firing line longer and in greater numbers. Only the durable goods left when the fighting ends can reasonably be taken into account. The disposition made of them must conform to the spirit of the master lend-lease agreements which have been negotiated with some of our allies. These provide that the terms and conditions of lend-lease settlement "shall be such as not to burden commerce between the two countries but to promote mutually advantageous economic relations between them and the betterment of worldwide economic relations." If machine tools which we have shipped abroad are needed for the reconstruction of countries which have borne the brunt of the war, it would be folly for us to demand that they be returned to us at once or paid for in cash. It is essential that no part of lend-lease should at any time be considered a debt. But it will be possible, in the international settlements and adjustments which must follow the war, to take into account, reasonably and generously, the peace-time value of the permanent installations which we and other nations have put into the common pool as contributions toward victory.

The spirit that has animated lend-lease on our part and on the part of our allies is a hopeful augury. There has been nothing like it before in the history of mankind. The peoples of many nations have joined hands and contributed their possessions unstintingly for the attainment of a common goal. Men capable of viewing self-interest with this degree of enlightenment are not incapable of building a genuinely free world.

IT HAS LONG BEEN our contention that metropolitan journalism has tended more and more to put itself upon a mercenary basis, pure and simple. For believing and saying this . . . we have been accused of ill-natured jealousy and many other unpleasant qualities. . . Now, no one will suspect Mr. J. W. Keller of the Recorder . . . of having his vision blurred by prejudice or fantastic ideals, and it is he who declares in the Forum that "the fundamental principle of metropolitan journalism today is to buy white paper at three cents a pound and sell it at ten cents a pound." He adds with equal truth: "In some quarters it does not matter how much the virgin whiteness of the paper is defiled, so long as the defilement sells the paper."—August 3, 1893.

THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES of the University of Alabama have resolved that "young women of not less than eighteen years of age, of good character and antecedents, who are able to stand the necessary examinations, be admitted to the sophomore class or any higher class of the university, provided that suitable homes and protection have been provided for them, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the president in consultation with the faculty." This action has met with such unqualified general approval that the faculty is not expected to make any invidious distinction on account of sex.—August 3, 1893.

Denmark Next?

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

THE Second Battle for Scandinavia seems about to begin. Swedish newspapers, which keep their ears close to the ground and have often accurately forecast events affecting Northern Europe, have commented with some excitement on Secretary of War Stimson's trip to Iceland prior to his arrival in Britain. The Svenska Dagbladet expressed doubts that the Secretary's inspection of American troops in Iceland was made for defensive purposes. The Social-Demokraten, a government paper, said in an editorial on July 13: "The inspection of American troops in Iceland may indicate that their long period of idleness will soon be ended. There is slight probability that they will be used in a distant theater of operations. The considerably increased preparedness in our country is evidence that Swedish political and military authorities are prepared for the storm likely to break round the corner—'before the leaves fall.' " Another paper, whose policy is on the whole pro-German, Nya Dagligt Allehanda, was even more specific: ". . . Sweden's situation is now perhaps more dangerous than at any time since the invasion of Scandinavia. Allied attacks through Norway and through Denmark are far from improbable. It is obvious what dangers and difficulties this would bring to us."*

Similar worried hints were rife in the Swedish press a few weeks before Hitler attacked Russia in June, 1941. Although they were largely discounted abroad as German propaganda plants, or as sensationalism, they were subsequently borne out by events. The Swedish intelligence service, although it has never been played up like similar institutions in other countries, works smoothly and efficiently among all belligerent nations.

Not only the Swedish press fears an early resumption of hostilities in Northern Europe; the Swedish government itself is feverishly preparing for such a contingency—at a moment when outwardly everything is quieter in that part of the world than it has been for a long time. Swedish reservists have been called up uninterruptedly since late spring. It has been officially announced that military maneuvers, which are usually discontinued in the summer months, will go on this year on the same large scale as in the past winter and spring. Traditional sports events have been canceled "for military reasons." More than two million copies of an outspoken booklet, "If War Comes," issued by the Board of Information and telling the population exactly what to do in any given emergency, are being distributed. Several recent press dispatches from Stockholm have strongly hinted at a coming change in Swedish foreign policy.

This preparedness on Sweden's part is matched by frantic German preparations along the Atlantic coast of Scandinavia and even in the Baltic. Perhaps the most interesting aspect of Germany's precautions is the fact that their center is slowly but steadily shifting from Norway to Denmark. An Allied invasion of Norway has long been anticipated on all sides, but hitherto speculation on coming war moves has usually overlooked Denmark. Actually, according to the most recent information from Swedish sources, the Germans now maintain a larger army of occupation—estimated at 200,000—in Denmark than in Norway, where, though the country is much bigger, only ten divisions, or a maximum of 150,000 men, are said to be stationed.

Germany's present preoccupation with Denmark indicates either that the Nazi high command has already written off Norway as untenable against a combined onslaught of Allied armies from the west and the east and is preparing a withdrawal to Denmark as an integral part of the "inner fortress" of Europe, or that it fears the Allies may by-pass Norway and, landing on Danish shores, make straight for the heart of Germany—a strategy which Winston Churchill is said to have favored even in the last war. Whatever the motive, German defensive preparations in Denmark have been recently stepped up and extended. Jutland today is a military camp from which all Danish armed forces have been evacuated and which civilians may enter only on special permits. The shallow coast bristles with barbed-wire fences, gun emplacements, and mine fields; whole "military towns" have been built at strategic points, and "anti-invasion centers" have been organized.

North of Esbjerg, the only important harbor on Denmark's west coast, a broad belt of five connecting land-mine fields has been laid out along the coast, the mines so arranged that they can be exploded simultaneously. This led recently to a grave accident, caused perhaps by sabotage, in which 122 people were killed, half of them Danish slave laborers.

Except for the fact that it is protected by three dangerous reefs, the Danish west coast is well suited for amphibious landing operations such as were carried out in southern Sicily. Other parts of the country are equally vulnerable, and the Germans are apparently taking no chances. According to latest reports, the island of Zealand, where the capital is situated, is also being heavily fortified, even along the east coast facing Sweden.

* The quoted passages are cited in News from Sweden of July 14.

Other occurrences in Denmark betray the conquerors' anxiety. The Rigsdag recently passed a law authorizing the government to confiscate land for defense purposes; the unavowed object of this measure was to give the Germans a free hand in converting the "Danish Riviera"—the coastal strip from Copenhagen northward to Elsinore—into a fortified zone. The Danish Minister of Justice, Thune Jacobsen, has issued new and drastic regulations authorizing the police force to fire without warning on any person suspected of sabotage. And the Danish police have been equipped for their new duties with rifles, machine-guns, and tear-gas pistols. In connection with this order a Rigsdag member, Robert Staermose, publicly protested on June 25 against the use of the Danish police to relieve the occupying power of such purely military tasks as guarding the coast and the railways. Incidentally, since the occupation the Danish police force has been increased from 3,205 to 8,021 men.

The possibility of an Allied counter-invasion that would turn Denmark into a battlefield lies heavy on Danish minds. Even the press manages occasionally, in spite of the tight censorship, to express its apprehensions. Thus the leading Conservative daily, the Berlingske Tidende, said recently: "Denmark, because of its location and traffic connections, could be used as a springboard to the Baltic coast of Germany, the most vulnerable point in Central Europe. . . . Its possession may be vital to an assault on Central Europe. We know that the Allied powers are making great preparations for an attack on the Continent. It can be launched through the Mediterranean or across the Channel, but Denmark is a third possibility" (my italics). The Copenhagen Socialdemokraten of May 25 said that preparations were being made to evacuate 150,000 people from the capital in an emergency. And the Chief of Civilian Defense at Aalborg has warned the population that they may soon have to spend several days in their cellars. The unprecedented bombing of Hamburg in the last few days also points to activity in the north. Hamburg is the hub of all communication lines into Denmark.

From these and many other signs a great blow appears imminent somewhere in Northern Europe. Whether it will be an all-out blow at Germany proper through the Danish bulwark or a strategic offensive in Norway for limited purposes, time alone can tell. Perhaps the Allies can even muster enough strength in the northern theater of operations to strike at both these Nazi-held countries at the same time. In any event Sweden is likely to experience a severe test of its neutrality. If it continues to grant Germany transit facilities to meet an Allied invasion of Norway, it may find itself at war with the Allies; if it stops this traffic, it may have to fight Germany.

Latest reports suggest that Sweden at last has found itself. The "change of foreign policy" hinted at in the press can only mean a shift toward the Allies. Probably the transit concession granted Germany three years ago will be withdrawn. There is a rumor that Foreign Minister Christian Günther and his pro-German colleague, Minister of Justice Karl Gustav Westman, will soon be dropped from the Cabinet. If this happens, we can be fairly sure that Sweden will not become an enemy.

The Chemical Revolution

BY FRANCIS WESTBROOK, JR.

MUCH has been written about the industrial wonders achieved in war-time America and the benefits they will bestow upon society after the peace. It does not detract from the accomplishments to point out that some of them will also cause severe dislocations here and abroad. Though one group or country may gain immeasurably, another may be the loser.

Our huge synthetic-rubber capacity promises to cause trouble. William M. Jeffers predicts that in 1944 we shall produce 850,000 long tons, almost three-fourths as much as the entire natural-rubber production of the world in 1939. Before the war rubber was our chief import, costing about $151,000,000 annually. Next year the picture will be reversed. We shall be supplying the major rubber needs of all our allies.

From a national point of view this is a remarkable achievement, and it holds great promise for the post-war years. It is still debatable how much of this industry will survive the restoration of world trade, but there are good reasons for believing that most of it will continue to produce. While synthetic rubber as we know it today is probably not so good as natural rubber in some respects, it is better in others. It resists oil, chemicals, and other agents destructive of the natural product. Since synthetic rubber is of several types, it can be "tailored" to specific purposes. And there is good reason to believe that chemists can correct certain weaknesses in the synthetic material.

The total investment in synthetic-rubber factories and auxiliary units probably will be close to one billion dollars by the end of the war. Although about three-fourths of this will represent government money, some of the largest corporations in the country have a stake in synthetic rubber and will wish to see the industry remain active. Labor, too, will be interested in this source of employment, though one of the startling aspects of the industry is that some 10,000 men in American factories can produce as much as 300,000 natives on Far Eastern plantations. However, opportunities for employment should develop as increasing amounts of raw material are supplied to the rubber mills.

The dark side of the picture appears when one begins to wonder what will happen to the rubber-growing countries of the East, especially British Malaya and the Netherland Indies, if their chief markets are seriously curtailed or permanently lost. The seriousness of this threat will be apparent to anyone remembering the plight of Chile's nitrate industries after synthetic nitrates were developed during the last war. Except for its tin mining and a little agriculture, British Malaya depends entirely on rubber production. The Netherlands Indies have other important industries, but there too the destruction of the rubber business would be a calamity. Siam, Ceylon, and French Indo-China would also suffer, as well as some regions in Africa and South America.

The threat is so real that it has been seriously proposed in some quarters in this country that in the interest of international trade we should scrap our rubber factories after the war. What the outcome will be no one knows. The course taken will depend on many factors, such as prices, post-war buying by rubber-consuming countries that have not established synthetic industries, the artificial barriers that may be raised, and the stimulants that may be applied. It is not yet known how cheaply we can manufacture synthetic rubber on a mass-production basis. Many believe that eventually we shall be able to produce it cheaply enough to compete with natural rubber at pre-war prices. This raises the question of how cheaply plantation growers will be able to sell.

Some countries will continue to consume natural rubber. Only the United States and Germany, and perhaps a few other European countries, are likely to be in an independent position. The demand, therefore, will not be wiped out at once, though it will be drastically cut. When the nations meet to make peace for the Far East, rubber will be a major subject of discussion. And the natural product will find an eager champion in Great Britain, for the economic welfare of at least one of its important colonies will be at stake.

Silk, too, will cause headaches at the Far Eastern peace table. The use of large amounts of silk by Western textile mills is a thing of the past. A few years ago silk was one of our most valuable imports. In the early thirties rayon drove it from the dress field. Its last stronghold was in hosiery, but after the peace women's stockings will be made of nylon or rayon. In European countries the manufacture of synthetic fibers is, if anything, more advanced than here. Japan has lost the market for its second most important export. China too will suffer.

This problem, however, has domestic as well as foreign ramifications, for rayon and nylon and the other synthetic fibers that have displaced silk also threaten to cut deep into the demand for cotton and wool. Rayon is being used more and more instead of cotton in automobile tires, which before the war took 10 per cent of all cotton consumed in this country. The new types of rayon developed for war uses will meet most requirements expected of sheets, shirts, work clothes, and many other items; they will be as comfortable and will wash as easily as cotton and in many cases will be stronger. There are indications that rayon will undersell cotton. Nylon, one of the important inventions of recent years, also has a brilliant future, not only for hosiery and clothing but for such diverse articles as rustless window screens, brushes, tennis racquets, and medical sutures.

Many persons believe that wool is more seriously threatened than cotton. Wool is an expensive fiber. And it has certain drawbacks, such as vulnerability to moths and a tendency to shrink in washing. Rayon and other synthetic fibers are free of these handicaps and possess other advantages—great strength, durability, and low cost—which will go a long way to offset wool's real and supposed merits.

Textile fibers today are made of casein, glass, peanuts, soy beans, asbestos, coal, air, and water, and plastics. And whereas formerly we had to take them pretty much as nature made them, today we design fibers specially for fireproof fabrics, carpets, hosiery, and an infinite variety of other materials; we give them tensile strength, resilience, softness, or hardness, as we require.

The resultant displacement of natural fibers may reach serious proportions. Thirteen million people live off cotton in this country alone. Another half-million gain their livelihood from the production of wool. Many of these people must adapt themselves to changed conditions. The wool-grower may have to raise sheep for meat rather than for wool and find other uses for some of his grazing land. The cotton farmer may find it advisable to emphasize the oil and food properties of his crop. Or he can produce cotton for the cellulose content of its lint, which he will sell to rayon and plastics factories instead of to cotton-textile mills.

Another group of developments may cause temporary dislocations in other industries, though in the long run they will stimulate business and bring social and economic gains. Striking advances, for instance, have been made in the fields of light metals, plastics, wood, paper, glass, and steel. By the end of the war we shall be producing seven times as much aluminum as in 1939. The production of magnesium, the lightest of all structural metals, will have increased a hundred-fold. Most of the magnesium is obtained from sea water, by means of huge pumps which force millions of gallons daily through an intricate chemical process. Since sea water contains traces of every element found on land, this new "mining" technique opens prospects of untold wonders. Huge quantities of aluminum and magnesium will be available at low cost for the manufacture of railway coaches, aircraft, automobiles, houses, boats, and other things requiring lightweight materials.

Resin-impregnated paper board is now manufactured to replace aluminum in airplane wing tips. This board is as strong as aluminum and has the advantage that it can be molded more easily. Paper barrels are displacing steel drums in the shipment of certain chemicals. Strong structural papers are expected to play an important role in low-cost post-war housing, where they can be used for partitions, ceilings, and perhaps walls. Plywood made by a union of plastics and wood has found wide use in airplanes, small boats, and buildings, in some cases as a substitute for structural steel. These developments facilitate the prefabrication of houses.

Plastics are now omnipresent in modern industry. Aircraft made of plastics are an accomplished fact. Some experts believe automobiles will be constructed of them after the war. They will become an important building material. For example, the transparent plastic now used to give free vision coupled with protection to gunners on war planes can be used for non-breakable windows in homes and greenhouses. The variety of plastic materials is endless. And like synthetic rubber and the new synthetic fibers, they can be "tailored" for the job.

Glass manufacturers, too, proclaim that they will provide post-war homes with non-breakable windows. The new strong glass in its various forms is also suitable for walls and partitions, furniture, and bathroom fixtures. Fireproof cloth is woven of glass fibers. Another type of glass is said to be so strong and elastic that it can be used to make springs for watches and clocks.

Meanwhile steel manufacturers are producing alloys so strong and light that they will compete with light metals, plastics, and wood where lightness and strength are important. New alloys with tremendous heat resistance will make possible smaller automobiles and aircraft engines, which will burn less fuel.

These developments will mean great changes in industrial and building practices. The new products will undoubtedly displace many conventional materials, but in the long run both manufacturer and consumer should benefit. Competition will hold prices to a minimum. We shall have a vast new array of materials for the manufacture of articles ranging from airplanes to ice boxes. Because the materials will be plentiful and cheap, consumption should greatly increase. While there will be less wood or glass or steel in any given house or car, so many more houses and cars will be produced that all materials will find larger markets.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Freezing Fascism In

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

ON JUNE 29 the New York Herald Tribune warned us in a leading article that "it would be painfully easy for an occupying force, in the interest of 'order,' to freeze Italy's Fascist organization in authority. It is less likely that the Allies would permit the opposite to occur—namely, the riotous competition of anti-Fascist groups for power—during the critical period of occupation."

A plan aiming to "freeze Italy's Fascist organization in authority had been published by the New York Times of May 19 as "elaborated in a special message from Pius XII to Archbishop Francis J. Spellman of New York." The Times has always faithfully reflected Vatican policies, and therefore the authenticity of its information cannot be doubted.

According to the Vatican plan, the Fascist Party would be "immediately disbanded," but the "present prefects" would not be considered to have been "active party supporters." They would be left in their posts as heads of civil administration under the orders of an Allied Commission sitting in Rome.

Even before Mussolini came to power in Italy, provincial prefects were not elected by the people, as American governors are. They were appointed by the Home Secretary. Mussolini chose his ninety-four prefects from among the most "active" members of his party. They are the cornerstones of the Fascist system. To "disband" the Fascist Party and leave the "present" prefects as heads of civil administration would be to leave the apparatus of the Fascist regime intact.

With these facts in mind, we can guess what, according to the Vatican plan, the occupying authorities would be expected to do when they occupied a town, say, in Sicily. They would dismiss the secretary and the directors of the local Fascist branch—if they had not already run away—and close the party headquarters. Should the Fascist militia also be disbanded? Since the prefect of the province would not be regarded as an "active" supporter of the Fascist Party, the officers of the militia, who are neither better nor worse than the prefects, might logically enjoy the same privilege. However, this would be so ridiculous that we can dismiss it altogether.

There is a mayor, or podestà, in the town. Under the Fascist regime mayors were not elected but were chosen by Mussolini on nominations made by the prefects in agreement with the local Fascist chiefs. According to the Vatican plan, the "present" mayor, like the "present" prefect of the province, would presumably be considered not to have been an "active party supporter."

The population of an Italian town is organized into associations of employers and professional men, and unions of clerks and laborers. These organizations are run by secretaries who have been appointed by the directors of the Fascist Party in agreement with the prefect, and who, accountable not to the membership but to the directors of the party, wield a despotic power over the membership. These men also would be considered not to have been active party supporters, and little time or effort would be needed to persuade them to carry on.

When the capital city of the province has been occupied, the local and provincial headquarters of the Fascist Party and the Fascist militia will be closed. But together with the "present" prefect, the mayor of the city and the secretaries of the local associations and unions will be left undisturbed. In the capital city there are also the "present" chief of police (questore), the chief justice (primo presidente della Corte d'Appello), and the attorney general (procuratore generale). They are as important as the prefect. The chief justice and the attorney general are even more hateful than the prefect and the chief of police, since they have prostituted justice for the benefit of the Fascist gangsters. But according to the Vatican plan they would doubtless also be regarded as "inactive" supporters of the Fascist Party.

If the chiefs of the occupying armies were not instructed to "freeze" Fascist authorities in power, what would they do? Let us take the instance of Palermo, a city of more than 400,000 inhabitants:

The correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, who was on the spot, told us on July 28 that two days before the Allies occupied the city, the military and civil authorities abandoned it, without a word of warning to the population. The prefect, the mayor, and the secretary of the Fascist Party in the province made off by airplane. They took away all the money they could lay their hands on, including the salaries of workmen and clerks. Thus there were in Palermo none of those "leaders" with whom the wise men of the British Foreign Office and the American State Department were ready to negotiate. Yet Palermo did not fall into that condition of "chaos and anarchy" of which Mr. Churchill warned the Commons on July 27.

People who for twenty years have swallowed Fascist misinformation wondered how a whole population could be transformed overnight from Fascist to anti-Fascist. The fact is that the overwhelming majority of the citizens of Palermo, and of all Italy, have always been anti-Fascist. The United States and Britain should not delude themselves. The Palermo demonstrations were anti-Fascist demonstrations which took the shape of "pro-Ally" demonstrations. The forces of occupation were welcomed and expected to act as "liberators." On the day they realized that the Americans and the British came there to "freeze" Fascist authorities in power, their enthusiasm would change to dangerous disappointment.

To be sure, nobody expects the forces of occupation to promote revolutions. They are there to win the war. When the war has been won, their duty is to enforce public peace. But it is one thing to enforce public peace, and it is quite another to keep Fascist authorities in power. Let us assume that the prefect, the mayor, and the secretary of the party in Palermo had not fled. They should then have been instantly removed from their posts, made prisoners of war, and sent to North Africa. The chief of police, the chief justice, the attorney general, the officers of the Fascist militia, and the local secretaries of the party, trade associations, and unions should have been dismissed from their posts. This would give everybody the immediate certainty that there would be no connivance between the Fascist authorities and the chiefs of the occupying armies.

When the Fascist "leaders" have run away, or been sent to Africa, their posts must be filled in a few days. The minor officials cannot carry on for long without directors. Here is the most difficult task for the chiefs of the armies of occupation.

A commissioner for civil administration should be appointed for each city and town. But he will not be acquainted with local conditions or persons. If our War Office has had enough vision, it has already singled out, from among the four and a half million residents and citizens of Italian origin in this country, two suitable advisers for each town or group of neighboring towns. They should be men of good education and unblemished record who are acquainted with the ways of living and thinking of the local population, and with the trustworthy men in each locality. I am afraid that nothing has been done along these lines. Let us therefore see what a commissioner could do without such help.

As I have already said, the Italian population is not an inert mass. It is organized into associations of employers and professional men and unions of clerks and laborers, and the Fascist secretaries of these local bodies should be instantly dismissed and confined as prisoners of war. But it would be a mistake to leave the trade organizations leaderless and inactive. They should be the cornerstones of the new regime. The membership of each organization should, as soon as possible, be summoned by the commissioner and empowered to choose a secretary in whom it has confidence. The members know each other. They know who, during the past twenty years, did not become an auxiliary of the Fascist evildoers. When the members of the trade organizations have elected their new secretaries, the latter would be allowed to designate the provisional mayor for the city or town, the prefect, and the other provincial high officials. Thus the first nucleus of a new free local government would be set up. The commissioner, of course, would retain the right to veto reckless decisions and to oust unreliable men.

This transition would not be so easy as retaining local Fascist officials in authority, just as persuading a man is not so easy as breaking his skull. Hosts of bandwagonists and fifth columnists will foist themselves on the commissioner, pleading their long-suppressed loyalty to democracy. Not even the wisest and shrewdest man could avoid blunders. But the worst of all blunders would be the "freezing" of Fascists in power. And blunders which cannot be avoided should be made by the citizens themselves, not by the commissioner.

Then after, let us say, six months or, at the most, a year of this provisional regime, the electorate would be summoned to choose, by universal suffrage, their permanent municipal and provincial administrators.

When one has comprehended the implications of the Vatican plan and those of a possible anti-Fascist—though not revolutionary—plan, one is in a position to understand the aims of Amgot. Some principles which deserve to be greeted with unqualified approval: the Fascist Party is to be abolished; "Fascist ringleaders are to be removed from office"; the "Fascist militia and the so-called Fascist youth organizations are to be abolished"; "anti-Semitic measures are to be annulled"; "within the limits of military necessity a free press and free speech is to be promulgated"; Amgot's mission is "to liberate the Italian people from Fascism, and when this is done, to restore Italy as a free nation"; "all governmental powers and jurisdiction in occupied territories are to be vested in the military governor and in Amgot"; "exercise of the power of the Crown of Italy is to be suspended"; "Amgot will attempt to govern the people of occupied provinces and cities through their own officials"; "measures are to be taken for the prompt release of political prisoners."

Particular approval must be accorded the principle that "there will be no negotiations with exiles or refugees." Exiles and refugees are private citizens who have no right to "negotiate" with anybody about anything. It is the Italians in Italy who, when they have set up their own local and central governments, will have to "negotiate" through their lawful representatives with the occupying authorities.

Uneasiness sets in when we are told that the new civil government "will be established without any communication between the anti-Fascist exiles and the people of Italy." If these words mean anything, they mean that men like Toscanini, Don Sturzo, Sforza, or Pacciardi will be held in the United States, as if America had become a concentration camp for them. To be sure they would commit moral suicide if they returned to Italy as Anglo-Saxon Quislings. But as soon as transportation becomes possible, they are entitled to return as private citizens and at their own risk. (The present writer is not one of the exiles who plan to go back to Italy. From the moment he made his declaration of intention, he ceased to regard himself as a refugee.)

Uneasiness grows when the Italians are warned that "no political activity of any kind will be allowed." How can free speech and a free press exist if no political activity of any kind is allowed? To forbid political activity is to reestablish one of the worst realities of Fascism.

Things go from bad to worse when we are informed that while the officials through which Amgot will try to govern "must not be active members of the Fascist Party," "some local officials who may have been active Fascists before the Allied landings will be retained in office." Here is the kernel of the matter, and on this point the Amgot plan and the Vatican plan are as alike as two rotten eggs. Amgot has borrowed from the Vatican plan even the distinction between "active" and "inactive" Fascists, but it goes one step farther to admit into the American-British fold even those Fascists who have been "active" right up to the moment of defeat.

A bad plan may prove good in good hands, and a good plan may become bad in bad hands. The head of Amgot will be Major Lord Rennell of Rodd. This name is a symbol. His father was ambassador to Rome from 1908 to 1919. Even when he was no longer ambassador, he was connected with Italian affairs and he and his son were enthusiastic admirers of Mussolini and fascism. A bad plan has been intrusted to the worst possible hands.

BY ARGUS

WE GET an idea of the goods scarcity in Germany from a new edict issued by Minister of Education Rust, the text of which was printed in the Frankfurter Zeitung on July 13. Herr Rust decreed that hereafter children should go to school barefoot provided the weather was good. If the parents protest, they will have to be taught that going barefoot is very healthful for children. An exception can be made only in the large cities. There the children may wear "light shoes." But if they do, they must be watched to see that they do not wear stockings also. Stockings, Herr Rust said, are superfluous in all cases.

Group Leader Jürgensen is one of the heads of the NSKK, or National Socialist Motor Corps. This is a large quasi-military organization to which the members give a few hours a day outside their regular work. Group Leader Jürgensen is not satisfied with the spirit in his corps. The Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter on July 20 was able to quote from a severe order he had recently issued to his troop. In it he criticized sharply a highly interesting development, namely, a growing tendency among members to conceal their affiliation with the NSKK and even with the Nazi Party. Many wear their uniform as little as possible; others pin their party badge, oh, so discreetly on the under side of their lapel. Such an attitude, the order said, is demoralizing. The public draws the conclusion that "the Nazis are no longer very sure of their cause."

When Bismarck in 1871 brought into existence the union of German states, the antagonisms between them did not vanish with its creation. On the contrary. The South German kingdom of Bavaria in particular emphasized its difference from the North German kingdom of Prussia. While Berlin followed a militaristic, feudal course, Munich steered one that was much more liberal, democratic, and civilized. This tradition continued until the end of the Kaiserreich, and it was thus the more astonishing that in the republican era Bavaria and Munich took on a very different character. Their transformation into a Mecca of the most rabid Teutonism and militarism, into the domain of Ludendorff and Hitler, seemed inexplicable. Some Bavarian psychologists, however, believed very definitely that this also was simply the result of opposition to Prussia. In Berlin after 1918 a democratic trend had become powerful; in consequence, said the Bavarian psychologists, Munich out of pure contrariness was bound to go Nazi. And they added, "If ever the Nazis make a triumphant entry into Berlin, you will see Bavaria become again rabidly anti-Nazis."

Whether this was good psychology or not, it is a fact that recently the decline of Nazism has been especially marked in Bavaria and Munich. One has only to recall the occurrences at the University of Munich a few months ago. Now the Swiss cousin of this journal, the Zurich Nation, in its issue of July 8, reports:

> It is interesting to note that Munich has recently become the center of strong oppositional tendencies which not only are directed against National Socialism but seek to lessen the unity of the German state and thus to make it possible for Bavaria to revert to its former autonomy.
> Although the active opposition is not great and is confined mainly to isolated individuals and small groups, passive resistance among large sections of the population has assumed such proportions that Munich, birthplace of the Nazi movement, has come to be called Nazi Germany's problem child.

A Forster Revival

E. M. FORSTER. By Lionel Trilling. New Directions: Makers of Modern Literature Series. $1.50.

THE least expected literary event of the season is one of its happiest and most inspiriting—a revival of the fiction of E. M. Forster. Alfred A. Knopf reissues "Where Angels Fear to Tread" and "Howards End" ($2.50 each); New Directions reprints "The Longest Journey" and "A Room with a View" ($1 each); with "A Passage to India" already in the Modern Library, all five of Forster's novels are thus restored to circulation. To accompany them comes the best full study of Forster's work and ideas yet written, by Lionel Trilling. The event, at this particular moment of literary and intellectual crisis, becomes more than a literary occasion: it takes on the force of a public service.

One would like to argue that a general enthusiasm for these brilliant but still neglected novels requires no critical instruction. They are among the wittiest, most original, most acutely stimulating and entertaining books of our time. They adhere to an established tradition of English comedy and criticism of manners and social conflict. The "condition of interest" is fully present, and old Forsterians will envy the uninitiated their impending shock of discovery and delight. But the possibility also exists of being deceived by Forster's superficial charms or vexed by his nettling reproof to passive attention and assent. He presents, as Mr. Trilling observed earlier, "a paradox which reverses the familiar one of the hard-boiled writer: his work looks soft but inside is hard as nails." The time has passed when the exactions of his critical insight and justice, his unflagging exercise of a moral realism very nearly unequaled in our time, can be left to accidental notice. Today it is not only the doldrums of fiction that his reappearance may relieve. It is also the greater atrophy or abdication of human and moral values—or the simplifying rigor of militant action on their behalf in which Forster has, for forty years, seen a danger fully as great as that of selfish apathy or liberal tolerance.

Forster has his limitations, his decided curtailment of creative temperament and action. They exist not only in his sometimes skittish mannerism and elusive decision of sympathy, in his condescension to adroit idiosyncrasy and "demurely bloodless gaiety" in his essays and shorter stories, in the refusals of recognition that shrink his critical perception (his judgments on James and Joyce sink to a pettiness which no creative prejudice can excuse), in his abrupt check to the demands of political commitment and responsibility. They appear more decisively in the fact that, "having twice mastered his art, he has twice abandoned it." Our feeling about him fluctuates, as Mr. Trilling says, "between disapproval of a dereliction from duty and a sense of relief that a fine artist has not seen art as a grim imperative." He seems to push his suspicion of action to passivity, and of beliefs to something close to a defeatism of will. His latest critic denies him the titles of great novelist, great critic, great thinker. But all this is the result of measuring by Forster's own standards the wholeness of his moral vision and his absolutely honest pursuit of the means by which that vision may be realized and applied to the life of muddle, evasion, compromise, and fear, of masked or stupefied purpose, at which his contemporaries have arrived. He is the historian of the fatal estrangements that underlie the defeats and humiliations of his age. He has offered it no easy palliatives. To its ethic of righteousness he has applied the Primal Curse, "the knowledge of good-and-evil"; to its morality of force and competition he has opposed the complex riddle of human relations; to its compulsive addiction to action and aggression he replies that it is the Inner Life that "pays"; to its tragic divisions of prose and passion, intellect and will, generous vitality and the protective hostilities of modern society, he poses his most passionate conviction—"Only connect." Lowes Dickinson once said that Forster's "kind of double vision squints." So it may—but we should compare what a microscope or the more ruthless lens of art exacts of our eyesight with what has been produced in this age of the fish by the smug eye of sanctimony, the glazed stare of obsession, or the lidless gaze of idiot fatuity before we credit that squint to myopia or a tic of nerves.

What plays everywhere in Forster's work is what plays in another form—to my mind in a lesser ethical and imaginative strength if in subtler directions—in the only other contemporary writing with which it closely compares, Gide's. It is a restless disquiet of moral sensibility, an uncompromising empiricism of sympathy and sincerity, the impulse, ondoyant et divers, of the skepticism of Socrates and Montaigne which takes as its duty the quickening to consciousness of human values and necessities that are eternally betrayed to the intolerance and brutality of social prejudice and force. This sensibility Forster has applied to a wide range of phenomena: to English cant and inhibition in conflict with the "vital mess" of Italy; to the rival claims of business and intelligence, ideals and actualities; to liberal tolerance at odds with the demands of emotion and of privation; finally to the baffling and dangerous hostility of races, worlds, and cultures in the enigma of India. Gide's ideal of the novel is also his: "a crossroads—a meeting place of problems," and so is another article of the Frenchman's faith: "Whatever your station or country, you should believe only what is true, and what you would be disposed to believe if you were of another country, another station, another religion." The dialectic intelligence of his art escapes casuistry by rooting itself in the facts of politics, of economy, and of passion. He has been, for forty years, one of the most privileged ushers down "the sinister corridor of our age" who have put their gifts at the disposal of statesmen, moralists, and educators. The fate of those gifts in these hands is a tragedy, but the tragedy is not literature's.

All this, and much more, is presented with superb tact and enviable understanding in Mr. Trilling's admirable study. He has written more than a book on Forster. It is an examination f the conscience of contemporary literature and thinking. Iis chapters on the five novels are brilliant successes in mak- ig summary and analysis count for critical results; his quota- ons are copious but always controlled; he has traced orster's sources, problems, and thought without misrepre- nting their variety and complex conditions; he has treated ith the finest justice Forster's "refusal of greatness" and e compensations that dignify it. I question some of his oints: I doubt that "Howards End," with its excessive hematization, is Forster's masterpiece; for me it compares ith the imperfect but more profoundly suggestive and inclu- ve power of "The Longest Journey" or "A Passage to dia" as "The Ambassadors" compares with "The Wings the Dove" in the work of James. I differ with some of is censures of detail and method in the novels, and with me of his indulgence of Forster's methods as a critic. But is is only to say that he has written an alive and stimulating ok as well as a sound and just one—one which will stand, yond Rose Macaulay's effusive tribute or the shorter studies Richards, Woolf, Leavis, Austin Warren, Shanks, and ter Burra, as the classic estimate of its subject. When he ys that Forster is "for me the only living novelist who can read again and again and who, after each reading, gives e what few writers can give us after our first days of novel- ading, the sensation of having learned something," I would alify his "only living" with English, but the caution would t be wholly convinced. It is twenty-five years this summer nce I read my first Forster novel; I have read some or all his work every year since then and have not yet finished. hen Mr. Trilling adds that "a consideration of Forster's ork is, I think, useful in time of war," he says what his ok fully verifies and what, with luck, this revival of the vels may succeed in proving. And when he concludes by ying that Forster "is one of those who raise the shield of chilles, which is the moral intelligence of art, against the nic and emptiness which make their onset when the will is ed of its own excess," he arrives at a tribute which few liv- g artists, of any kind, as honestly inspire or deserve.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

The World Goes Toward . . .”

FLECTIONS ON THE REVOLUTION OF OUR TIME.
By Harold J. Laski. The Viking Press. $3.50.

HAROLD LASKI'S new book has two faces, the one historical, the other philosophical. After this book— rticularly its historical section—it is no longer possible for lians to complain that the success of Fascist propaganda the one side and certain theoretical prejudices of Marxist thodology on the other obscure, for outsiders, the simple ential truths about fascism. Harold Laski's explanation the origins and development of the Fascist adventure and all its foreign complicities is perfect; perfect in serene ough cruel detachment, perfect in psychological under- nding, perfect in its human sympathy toward the poor lian people who are guilty, of course, for not having re- ted against fascism, but were also bewildered by the miration, servility, and fear accorded by the capitals of the rld to the man without whom no Hitler would ever have appeared. (The first thirty million marks Hitler got for his secret propaganda came to him from Mussolini, not from the Ruhr magnates; their gifts followed.)

Speaking of the Duce-Führer myth, Laski says:

> The leader must be immensely above his followers, but he must be also one with them and of them; distance must not interfere with the sense of intimate communion. So that leader, who is godlike, is also of common clay. He is the little man who failed in the "pluto-democracy" he came to supplant, so that all the little men who failed under that social order may recognize themselves in him.

It is by means of many such insights that Laski shows the true essence of fascism: it represents the lower middle classes in power for once, with all their pathetic illusions and naive stupidity. Probably what they most liked in Mussolini was the fact that for the first time they found a man in power who spoke their own elementary language. The same thing happened in Germany. Not in Russia, never: the theological disquisitions of Lenin on Marxist principles were not only far above the Russian masses; they were even over the average heads of the Communist oligarchy.

Laski's pages on fascism are so good that from the historical point of view only one point might be added: How did it happen that a nation which had given so many heroes to the long struggle from 1821 to 1860 against Tedeschi and the Bourbons offered so weak a resistance to fascism, although a resistance infinitely stronger than in Germany? Because most Italians went on saying, "It is too stupid; it cannot last." And many added, "Our grandfathers fought and died against the Hapsburgs and the Bourbons because they were powerful monarchies: they had to risk their lives to get rid of them; but should we really die for a gang of corrupt comedians?" It was at that time that Victor Emmanuel of Savoy, still trying to remain a constitutional king, said to Briand, who repeated it at once to me, "They are a bunch of fools, they cannot last long."

They lasted, just as the most typical pre-Fascist ruler of three generations ago had lasted; and Napoleon III was probably even more stupid than Mussolini. The end of the Corsican-Dutch adventurer was Sedan, just as the invasion of Italy is the end of Mussolini—and, let us hope, of all his accomplices, beginning with Victor Emmanuel of Savoy, who is guilty of having gradually moved from his skepticism of 1923 to a long series of betrayals and perjuries from 1926 to 1940.

Laski's chapter on Russia leaves me more dubious. It is too soon to assert dogmatically that the Russian Revolution will prove to be a much greater historical event than the French Revolution. It would be more prudent to wait for the developments of Russian history after this war, in which the Russian masses have fought under Stalin just as heroically as they fought under Peter the Great or Alexander I. I do not mean to exclude the possibility that a new myth or gospel may also have been a great force. A messianic conception has always thrived among the Russians. In the second half of the fifteenth century, when Constantinople fell into the hands of the Turks, a Russian monk proclaimed that Moscow would some day become the third Rome, the second having been Byzantium. Dostoevski did not feel much differently in the nineteenth century. And in the twentieth the Third International was again a manifestation of the same old thought, since Russian communism is, or has been, at once an expression of international socialism and of traditional Russian tendencies.

What strikes me most about the Russian Revolution is the crass stupidity and shortsighted selfishness of the conservatives of Western Europe; this stupidity became criminal when they discouraged Russia from becoming a dynamic member of the League of Nations at the time of Litvinov's efforts toward a true collective security. Against these classes—the same which built up Mussolini during fifteen years—Laski is severe; but not severe enough.

I like less the philosophical part of Laski's book, but it is my fault, only my fault. I have never been able to swallow intellectual exercises revolving around the eternal affirmation "the world goes toward . . ." Of course, even in this field Laski is infinitely above the cheap Spengler type, but the genre remains. It is only too evident that the world goes always toward new forms and new transformations—economic transformations, technical transformations; it is quite natural to try to foresee whether, for example, the economy of the future will be communistic or based on free competition.

The danger is—not of course for a man of Laski's moral courage, but why not for many of his readers?—that these prophecies may eliminate efforts of will or of thought, through the hypocritical admission that one obeys a "historical necessity," while we should obey, all of us, the moral necessity which our conscience imposes on us. What matters is, not to know where the world goes, but to know where we go, each one of us.

In a world shaken by a crisis less deep than ours Mazzini said to the Italians, "You will not create better situations if you do not yourselves become better." I believe more in Mazzini's message than in Oriental or Western determinisms.

Dr. Seagrave

BURMA SURGEON. By Lieutenant Colonel Gordon S. Seagrave, M.D. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

DOCTORS AWEIGH. By Rear Admiral Charles M. Oman (M. C.), U. S. N. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

JACK BELDEN, in "Retreat With Stilwell," tells of seeing a doctor perform an operation on a porch while flames were consuming Burma; later the doctor and his native nurses accompanied General Stilwell's party in their terrible trek over the mountains to India.

That doctor was Gordon Seagrave, and he is a story in himself—a story of courage in peace as well as in war, a story of life-long heroism of the sort that usually goes unrecorded.

Dr. Seagrave's father, grandfather, and great-grandfather had been evangelistic missionaries in Lower Burma, but young Gordon rudely broke with tradition to become a medical missionary instead. He started out in Upper Burma with a waste-basketful of instruments he had salvaged from Johns Hopkins. When a native came to him needing an operation which he had never before performed, he studied every detail in his books, then he was sick, then, still nau seated, he performed the operation. Luck, as he calls it, wa with him; he won the natives' confidence and soon neede nurses to help him. Since none were available, he did wha nobody ever had attempted: he trained girls of the nativ races to be nurses, using four languages: English, Burmese Shan, and Kachin. Since there was no textbook of nursing in his spare time he wrote one in Burmese.

No obstacle was too great for this incredible man. H needed a hospital, and there were no builders. He and hi wife, working day and night, hauled hundreds of tons o stone and cement 130 miles from Lashio—stopping abruptl when a tiger or leopard appeared in the road—and built th hospital. He was a little man with a big bass voice, and h had no one with whom to sing; so he taught the nativ nurses of varied races to sing hymns. This turned out to b a real help to their morale before and during the Battle o Burma.

Of course Seagrave was not a good doctor, as the missio medical examiner in New York once said, because he go infected himself with malaria and dysentery. He should hav climbed into his mosquito net at dusk every evening instea of trudging through jungles in the middle of the night an swering emergency calls. Bubonic plague came to norther Burma, and he got a touch of that, too. Moreover, he incurred the ire of the British authorities by insisting on compulsory vaccination of the natives. He kept on insisting, an he stopped the plague before it crossed into China; he di not want to see Chiang Kai-shek's armies crumble from a epidemic. It is at least conceivable that Dr. Seagrave, by hi personal courage and intelligence, thereby did more tha any single general toward saving the United Nations' caus before the United States ever entered the war.

When war came, General Stilwell was smart enough t seize hold of a lowly medical missionary and make him major. Dr. Seagrave, naively proud, continued his life-savin while bombs were falling. Then he and his nurses marche over the mountains in the famous retreat. All the while h was ill with malaria, and his feet were covered with atrociou sores. He reached India barely alive—and immediately se up a hospital to save the lives of straggling military an civilian refugees following along that horrible trail.

Dr. Seagrave wrote "Burma Surgeon" himself, simply informally, with humor. It is good that no ghost-writer in tervened, because in these pages one meets, face to face, great man.

One of the mildly fascinating things about the war book is the way they mesh. The persevering reader keeps comin across the same tales from different angles. In "Doctor Aweigh" Rear Admiral Oman is interested, for example, i Eddie Rickenbacker's escape after twenty-one days at se primarily because it illustrated points the navy medical servic has been thinking about, such as the effects of dehydration o shipwrecked humans, how to guard against immersion foot and the merits of certain fish juices. The Admiral skips alon to the story of Dr. Wassell, whom he makes a much mor forceful and believable character than did James Hilto
And in this cheerily eclectic book we hear again about Pea Harbor, with emphasis on the astonishing role played b sulfa drugs and blood plasma.

Admiral Oman, who has been a navy doctor for forty years, is interested in all manner of problems, from rounding up lepers in Guam to dealing with the bodily phenomena of a flier who for a few seconds weighs 1,000 pounds or more at the upturn of his bombing dive. The Admiral enjoys telling stories, whether they happened to him or not, and he wanders interestingly although haphazardly through the whole range of navy medical experience.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Human Rights and Human Society

THE RIGHTS OF MAN AND NATURAL LAW. By Jacques Maritain. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

IT IS ironic that two books as diverse in their treatment of a common subject as Burnham's "The Machiavellians" and this small volume by Jacques Maritain could have been issued within a single year. The contrast between them is at least as great as the contrast between the thirteenth century and the sixteenth. And yet, despite Burnham's "realism," his book is probably the more provincial of the two, and certainly the more dogmatic.

Professor Maritain is of course a Catholic, the foremost modern disciple of St. Thomas, and he is concerned here with two related but sometimes conflicting matters: the natural basis of human society and the divine basis of human rights. A good Aristotelian, the nature of a thing is defined for him by its function, and he sees society as both an expression and an imperfect fulfilment of human needs. Like his master St. Thomas, and in the words of his Anglo-Catholic contemporary T. S. Eliot, he is convinced that "society is for the salvation of the individual and the individual must be sacrificed to society." But while the state has temporal autonomy, "the human person naturally transcends the state, to the extent that the former enfolds a destiny superior to time"; so that "law . . . is law only if just and promulgated by legitimate authority, not because the majority or the state can be the standard of conscience." What this implies, of course, is the foundation of every orthodoxy, that there is one incontrovertible basis of moral judgment which reason can discover and to which the will must conform; and in an essay of this sort that is the crucial assumption. Yet it is precisely at this point that Professor Maritain's ingenuousness almost disarms criticism: natural law is simply "an order" defined by "the necessary ends of the human being," since "there is a human nature and this human nature is the same in all men"—a statement which in this context is trivial if true, and in the sense in which it is intended is undoubtedly false. Certainly it doesn't refute the fact—always embarrassing to a theologian—of moral diversity. And Maritain indirectly confesses as much when, with Pascal, he deplores Montaigne's observation "that among certain peoples, incest and thievery were considered virtuous acts."

It is very easy to quarrel with Professor Maritain's assumptions, to question his metaphysical motives; yet it is false to underrate either his influence or his good-will. His bias in this book, for example, is surprisingly secular, and though he adds nothing to our knowledge of modern society, much of what he says is sound and admirable. Himself a former Socialist, he denounces "bourgeois individualism"—repeatedly using that phrase—as vehemently as any Marxist; but though he looks forward to a gradual abridgment of private enterprise, he is convinced that private property and what he calls a "pluralist society" are essential conditions of freedom.

This aversion to unified political authority, which is certainly unusual in a scholastic thinker, leads him to propose, instead of collectivism, a system of "associative ownership of the means of production" by "management-technicians, workers, investors." The merits of such an idea are not unquestionable, as any scholar of economics will show, yet what is chiefly significant is how Maritain envisages the role of society as the progressive conquest of servitude and inequality—moral, material, and intellectual—as the steady liberation of human creative energies, and, finally, as the "establishment of a brotherly city where man shall be free from misery and bondage." Inseparable from its theology, the message can nevertheless be read in secular terms; and it should commend itself, especially in this dark time, to humanists everywhere.

Professor Maritain's book is so generous, and even sagacious, in its social idealism that one regrets both his addiction to metaphysics and the fact that his ultimate commitments are other than naturalistic. For like most works of its kind, much of it is written with a calculated vagueness that borders sometimes on obfuscation. The first pages tell us, for example, that "the aim of society is its own common good" (Maritain's italics), which is not the same as the "individual good or the mere aggregate of the individual goods of each of the persons who constitute it." But surely it is difficult to imagine what else it could be; and one suspects that in spite of Maritain's clear intention to the contrary, room has been left for political authoritarianism of some sort: one feels that the chief intellectual adversary of freedom is not fascism or any other alternative doctrine, but confusion.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

Fiction in Review

IN A curious fashion it is at once the achievement and the misfortune of S. I. Hsiung's "The Bridge of Heaven" (Putnam's, $2.75) that less than halfway through it I had forgotten it was a novel about China, written by a Chinese, and had begun to judge it as I would judge any Western novel. For clearly, in proportion as a novel is a good novel, it invites the creative participation of the reader; we all of us, however unconsciously, write as we read; this participation is our stake in a work of fiction, and we instinctively turn away, bored or untouched, from the novel which doesn't invite us to share in its creation. Yet obviously this participation is possible only when a novel deals with people close enough to ourselves culturally for us to make some sort of identification with them. In the case of Oriental fiction such a wall of mystery separates us from the Oriental way of thinking that the identification is very difficult; the best of Western readers are likely to approach a novel of China or Japan as if it were a work of non-fiction—educational or quaint, but not our kind of fun. As it were a priori denied a share in the creative experience, we are robbed of our most reliable way of judging a novel, and so we cease to judge at all.

Well, it is the achievement of "The Bridge of Heaven" that it contradicts this generalization. Mr. Hsiung not only writes flawless English, but except for details of local color his novel might quite as well be about English, Americans, or Frenchmen as about Chinese; for that matter, a novel about the Chinese nationalist revolution which overthrew the Manchu dynasty; its psychological and ideational tone is so little peculiarly Chinese that, with the necessary changes of names, places, etc., it could be a strictly routine statement of revolution anywhere. Either Mr. Hsiung is unusually assimilated to Western culture or—what is more likely—the wall of mystery between the East and West can be more easily broken through than we have been led to suppose. But here lies the misfortune of his novel: it makes it possible for the Western reader to share in the creative process, judgment is restored, and we read "The Bridge of Heaven" as we would read its Western counterpart, without fear or favor —and conclude that it is estimable, workman-like, but hardly worth getting excited about either one way or another. Like any one of the dozen American novels on national themes which appear each season, Mr. Hsiung's novel is a useful refresher in history but no real contribution to world literature.

Perhaps I should add that this opinion runs counter to the copious judgments, quoted on the dust jacket, which compare Mr. Hsiung to everyone from Goldsmith to Dickens. Myself, I found the irony which pervades the first section of the book self-conscious and tiresome, and the humor heavy-handed. In fact, I am afraid that my admiration for this first novel by the author of the highly successful play "Lady Precious Stream" pretty much ends with my admiration for his tasteful prose.

Another novel to which my response will probably be of the minority is "I Am Thinking of My Darling" by Vincent McHugh (Simon and Schuster, $2.50). Labeled an adventure story, Mr. McHugh's novel is actually a fantasy of what would happen to New York if a large part of the population were suddenly infected by the virus of instinctive behavior; what does happen is that people quit their jobs, money makes no difference, telephones go dead and elevators stall, women throw their skirts over their heads in the streets to pull down their girdles, and offer themselves to the hero in a number to satisfy the imaginings of the most incorrigible fifteen-year-old. Also the medical-research people have a field day.

It strikes me as a disappointingly primitive notion of instinctive behavior coming from someone who seems to be second only to Aldous Huxley as a delver into the scientific mysteries. Of course an author is entitled to his own fantasies, and if Mr. McHugh chooses to make his virus a microscopic bluebird, he must be allowed his Saroyan. But I would have preferred a little less love-and-happiness and a little more of what really makes people tick—it's more adventuresome. Too, something in me doesn't relish the combination of city planning and biochemistry with hot jazz. That, however, may be a prejudice.

DIANA TRILLING

MUSIC

PART of the compensation for the writing of this column has been the pleasure I have had from some of the letters it has brought me. Several have come from a reader in a North Carolina university town who first wrote to me two and a half years ago about record distribution in the provinces (more about that in a moment). A little over a year ago he turned up in person to give me a report on music in the provinces. He was on his way home from the Ann Arbor Festival; and I was interested in his account of the doings at such occasions: the Philadelphia Orchestra playing without some of its first-desk men, participating after insufficient rehearsal in a performance of Honegger's "King David" with the University Choral Union, playing a concerto with Feuermann—if I remember correctly—with no rehearsal at all. But more interesting and impressive was his description of music in his own province: of the violinist in this town, the violist in that one, the cellist fifty miles away, the horn player in another part of the state, and all the other musicians similarly scattered about traveling long distances to rehearse for concerts of chamber music, to sit in with the university orchestra for symphony concerts, and to take part in annual Mozart festivals including—believe it or not—performances of the operas.

The war had begun to interfere with all this; and the letter which I received from him the other day came from Boston, where he had been sent by the army. It described the first of the concerts that are being given this summer by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and contained observations which I think will be interesting to other readers of this column. The program included Mozart's Divertimento K. 251, part of the "Haffner" Serenade K. 250, and the Piano Concerto K. 453; the orchestra comprised two of each woodwind, two horns, four first violins, three second violins, two violas, two cellos, one bass; and he writes: "The balance was just right, except in a few tuttis in the concerto, when the winds were a little strong for the strings. The orchestra was just large enough to make a plausible body of sound for the fortes, and small enough for every part, every line to come through with clarity. The strings played well, but it is the wind playing I will remember longest for ensemble and tone . . . and of all the wind players I will remember longest M. Gillet's oboe playing. . . .

"Mr. Goldovsky conducted like an amateur who was doing the one thing in the world he wanted to do: play music he was in love with. If he did not have the orchestra under an iron control, it was not necessary: the men knew what they were supposed to do, and Mr. Goldovsky knew the music and knew how he wanted it played. To my mind the performances were thus preferable to many American performances, which have a cast-iron mechanical perfection about them which renders them distasteful to me: they are so mechanically perfect that I am given to wondering whether the musicians knew, or cared, or had any feeling for the music they were playing. It is the absence of this quality that causes me to enjoy the performances of the old London Philharmonic under Sir Tommy: the performances are human enough to let you know whether the people are playing intelligently; and whether it is music they understand and enjoy. . . . It is for this reason that I often enjoy a performance by amateurs who, if they do not play with such perfection, play with love and intelligence, to a performance by professionals. This afternoon we had professionals playing with the spirit of amateurs, which, to my way of thinking, is best of all."

As for that letter about record distribution, my correspondent, whose family had a camera business, contrasted the Eastman Company's method with that of Victor and Columbia. The Eastman Company dealt directly with its retailers, who ordered from the company's warehouses and received what they had ordered within a week or ten days. Victor and Columbia, on the other hand, dealt with retailers only through intermediate jobbers with exclusive franchises for their regions; and my correspondent described the delays which resulted from this set-up. Even if the recording which the retailer ordered was a popular or recent one that the regional jobber had in stock, it took at least ten days to arrive; but if it was an older recording or something out of the ordinary that the jobber did not keep in stock and that he had to order from the factory, it never took less than a month, often took two months, sometimes took six, and sometimes never arrived at all. And if the set arrived with broken or scratched records there were the same procedure and delays with replacements.

I inquired about this of people in the trade, whose explanation was that each of the regional jobbers had too small a territory to be able to stock the entire catalogue, and that the factory did not keep stocks of everything in the catalogue on hand to take care of orders as they came in, but preferred to wait for a large number of orders to pile up before it pressed an older or out-of-the-ordinary item. Instead of publishing all this I tried the experiment of being "constructive": I had the Nation forward my correspondent's letter to the president of the parent corporation of one of the companies to see what improvement this would produce in the situation. It brought the expected assurance that the company's service to dealers and public was perfection, and a request for information that would enable the company to investigate; and months later, when I wrote to ask, my correspondent reported a slight improvement in service, but not enough to have kept him from giving up the buying of records altogether. I had written to ask because of another reader's complaint about the months of delay in obtaining records from the cooperative of a large eastern college, which had explained its difficulties in getting them from the regional jobber who in turn had to get them from a factory which waited for orders to accumulate before it pressed the records. Both complaints, I should add, credited Columbia with giving a little better service than Victor at that time—1941, which was long before the present shortages produced by the war (my North Carolina correspondent wrote about experiences as far back as 1935). I hope the companies are planning a method of distribution that will improve their service when the war is over.

A New Republic Supplement

REACTION in CONGRESS —THE RECORD

Everybody knows the 78th Congress is bad. Editorial writers have called it "hog-wild"; it has "gone berserk," "run amuck" and "gambled with the war."

But in this apparent madness there is method. An Unholy Alliance of die-hard Democrats and Martin Republicans are ruthlessly using the emergency for the purpose of making the country over in the image of Sen. McKellar of Monkey-Trial Tennessee.

To realize just how viciously Congress has knifed at progress—and to draw the right conclusions from its recent actions—you must look at the voting records of the individual members.

How did your Congressman vote on the vital measures affecting the war, labor, farm production and the price structure on which domestic morale depends? Who voted for victory and who voted recklessly to hamstring the President whether in malice or for party advantage?

Last year The New Republic's supplement A Congress to Win the War placed squarely before the country the record of the obstructionists in Congress who were blind to the menace of war. This year Reaction in Congress—The Record reports the votes, the absentees, and the pairs of all members of the House and Senate on twenty key measures. The tabulations reveal those who are obstructing the domestic program, fighting Roosevelt rather than Hitler and Tojo, and encouraging the enemy to prolong the war. It shows who are the good and valiant men and women in both parties, those who have not played politics with the lives of American soldiers.

Reaction in Congress—The Record appeared as a supplement to the August 2 issue. Vhat's the Evidence?

ear Sirs: Whether one agrees or disgrees with James Boyd's point of view garding the proper strategy for Neroes in the present crisis, one cannot cept his assumptions concerning huan nature and the nature of race concts.

Mr. Boyd states at the beginning of is article that the most rudimentary actor affecting the Negro's position in merican society is "man's primitive ntagonism to the strange." As evidence states that "the alien cast up on the each is killed because his color, speech, nell are different." This assumption oncerning "man's primitive antagonism the strange" is not new. It belongs mong the many erroneous folk beliefs oncerning human nature. There is no ientific evidence either in psychologil or anthropological research to subantiate it. Unless they are otherise conditioned by personal experience, aditions, or customs, the attitude of en toward the strange is properly deribed as fascination. When a white ild first meets a black person he does ot experience a feeling of antagonism r even fear. Mr. Boyd should know is from the history of blacks and hites in the South. Moreover, he ould have learned from the history f race relations in the South that when e Negro had a well-defined status in e social organization as well as in the onomic organization of the South durg slavery and relations between the vo races were regulated by an estabshed etiquette, not only was there no acial antagonism but the maximum inmacy between the two races could be aintained. One would like to know hat evidence Mr. Boyd has for his atement that "the alien cast up on the each is killed" because he is strange. rom what I have read of such inances, people have regarded aliens ith fascination at first and then have isposed of them according to their ustoms and beliefs or interests. Somemes the stranger has been treated as god and accorded special respect, and hen he was eaten, it often occurred ot because he was strange but because was thought to possess some special ower or virtue.

In view of these facts, it is unnecesary to attribute the attitude of whites toward Negroes to an impulse "rooted in nature's urge to eliminate the atypical from her breeding program." If there had been such a mystical urge in nature, the appearance of Homo sapiens in the course of evolution would have been impossible. Whether one accepts the Darwinian hypothesis concerning variations in nature or the findings of modern genetics, one must conclude that the evolutionary process has been characterized by the breeding of the atypical. When one considers breeding in man, it is clear that even if such a thing as "nature's urge to eliminate the atypical" ever existed, the urge has been nullified by human association and customs and traditions. Not only the Portuguese and the Spanish but in some instances even the British in their relations with colonial peoples have not shown an urge to eliminate the atypical. To bring the matter closer home, it is common knowledge that although mixed bloods in the South have not become a part of the white social organization, they have enjoyed some special privileges, and there has been no general urge to eliminate them.

In the light of these facts Mr. Boyd's assumptions concerning human nature and the nature of race relations appear as mere rationalizations of current attitudes of whites. Although racial attitudes are not fundamentally affected by showing that the rationalizations which support them are false, it is necessary to insist that those who discuss race relations dispassionately and on a scientific plane base their arguments upon science rather than folk beliefs concerning human nature and biological urges.

In Defense of Teachers

Dear Sirs: I have just read Mr. Barnard's very able discussion of the Good Teacher problem in your July 3 issue. As I said in my letter to him I found myself in perfect agreement with his entire thesis, with the exception of one item: more, not less, work should be required of young student teachers in the field of child and adolescent psychology. Unfortunately too many of our teachers and administrators know surprisingly little of what really makes Johnny tick. From this ignorance come many brilliant non sequiturs, vast misunderstanding, sharp conflicts, emotional disturbances.

But otherwise Barnard is dead right. The teaching profession, which should be one of the most highly respected in American life, is often instead the subject of farce and caricature. It is true the profession is riddled with adolescence. It is true that thousands go into it because they have the fear of competing in the outside world. The system serves as a good, omnipotent, all-giving Mother (a check regularly, specific hours, tenure very often, etc.). But to many men and women teaching offers creative possibilities that are limitless. Given a fighting chance, the intelligent, progressive, vigorous school teacher—and the element is growing—can do as nifty a piece of creative work as a Kuniyoshi with brush and palette or a Jo Davidson with chisel and marble. He can, and I mean this literally, build a healthier, more wholesome, more democratic America. But when in the midst of a war for survival and for democracy—just listen to some of the fascist talk in school—a man can be criticized by a superior for scratching his ear ever so lightly while he is giving a terribly vital lesson on democracy, he begins to follow the "letter" of the teaching day, not the spirit. In order to avoid criticism he applies himself to form not content, shadow not substance. This is one of the reasons why the artists in teaching go begging; why teaching is so often the enthronement of mediocrity.

Of course, "the real villain of the piece," as Barnard puts it, "is an unenlightened and indifferent public." All right, let's enlighten the public. We've done it before. We've moved a long distance from the time when a young schoolmaster had to explain to the town fathers why he had had the temerity to walk down the street with his female secretary (read Professor Elsbree's book "The American Teacher" for other indignities teachers have experienced).

But there is still a long distance to go. Let's rid ourselves of our notorious timidity and reticence. Let's communicate the real facts to the American people and show them that, when we're allowed to, we do a preciously important job with Johnny and Janie. We want to be respected for the job; we want the profession of teaching accorded the dignity it deserves, and, lest I forget, we want the teacher properly remunerated—the teacher shortage in the country today is no accident. Let's make the teaching profession something more than a stepping-stone to better things. Let's make it the noble profession it is. Only in this way will it attract the country's better students.

Mr. Barnard has done a real service with his long letter. He is to be congratulated. But what are we going to do about it? CHARLES G. SPIEGLER

It Depends

Dear Sirs: In the American Agency bulletin under the heading Federal Crop Death Sentence appears the following paragraph: "The collapse of the government's $35,000,000 FCIC vindicates the long-established belief of leading American farm underwriters, namely, that crop insurance has never been necessary, that too great a risk is involved, and that the expense of handling the program is so high that an adequate premium rate is created out of all proportion to what a successful farmer would be willing to pay [my italics]."

Contradictions mean nothing to the writer of the article. Later in this same article appears this statement: "It was tried by one or two large fire-insurance companies more than twenty-five years ago and rejected inasmuch as it involved a risk unsuitable for private carriers."

Assuming that the writer is correct in stating that crop insurance involves a risk unsuitable for private carriers, it does not follow that it is unsuitable for the government as a carrier. Incidentally, with very few exceptions, the private carriers ducked out on war-damage insurance and were very insistent that the government must handle it because it was too big a proposition for private interests. The essence of the matter seems to be that if you can make money at it, it is a matter for private enterprise; if you can't make money at it, it is a matter for the government, provided you happen to be among those who are likely to get hurt. However, if you are not among those who are likely to get hurt, the government shouldn't interfere either.

Despite the fact that I am in the insurance business I can't quite follow the reasoning of ever so many who are connected with it. JACOB PODOLOFF

Appeal to Good Neighbors

Dear Sirs: The Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America has received a request from Jorge Falcon, editor of Hora del Hombre, of Lima, Peru, regarding the recent fire that destroyed the National Library of Lima.

> The fire at the Biblioteca Nacional represents a lamentable loss that can never be replaced without the help of the people, the intellectuals, and the institutions of all other countries of America. . . .
> Since this fire affects us directly as being among the intellectual defenders of culture and of the democratic principles which encourage its development, we, the editors of Hora del Hombre, a magazine designed to maintain Peruvian thought and Peru's cultural position in the world, take the initiative for making an appeal to all intellectuals and their representative institutions in all countries of America to solicit their cooperation in the creation of a new Biblioteca Nacional by donating books, documents, and collections. . . .
> We should like to note that our request is not official and has no connection with the Peruvian government; it is made entirely on our own initiative. Thus all packages should be sent directly to the Ministerio de Educación, Pública, Dirección de Extensión Cultural y Educación Artística, at Lima, Peru. . . .

All serious books, manuscripts, or libraries in Spanish, English, or any other language should be sent to the above address. LLOYD MALLAN

Prophet of the Common Man

Dear Sirs: I read in the New York Times Book Review of July 11 a sympathetic review by John MacCormac of Henry A. Wallace's book "The Century of the Common Man," a collection of speeches delivered by him in the course of two and a half years, edited by Russell Lord and published by Reynal and Hitchcock. The review was printed under the heading, "Mr. Wallace views the Future with Steadfast Faith. A Noble Credo for Tomorrow."

As I had had the good fortune to read most of the speeches and writings of Mr. Wallace, I was grateful to Russell Lord and the publisher, for I saw in this a wonderful opportunity for the men and women of our armed forces to get acquainted with the thoughts and ideas of our Vice-President, who is the spokesman and prophet of the common man.

I therefore purchased through The Nation 610 copies of the book to be distributed to the libraries and reading-rooms of the navy and army and also the merchant marine.

But six hundred books are only a drop in the bucket, and it would be nice if some of your readers would join me in this venture.

Bewildered

Dear Sirs: A group of Latin American writers at present in the United States wish to express spontaneously and publicly our bewilderment that "South American Journey," Waldo Frank's latest book, should be having in his own country a critical reception so little in accord with the book's great importance.

In this moment, when inter-Americanism is being everywhere proclaimed as the vital problem of the continent, there is neglect of a work which, more than any of the others recently published on this theme, can contribute to a real understanding of the peoples south of the Rio Grande.

We may or may not dissent from the political opinions of Waldo Frank. But we are all agreed that "South American Journey" is the work of a true writer; it does not consist of the anecdotal and conventional observations with which the "professionals" of pan-Americanism have surfeited us; on the contrary, it is the conscientious and deep study of an American who has approached us on the level of equality and understanding with no condescension and no puerile search for the exotic.

Waldo Frank brings to the cause of inter-Americanism his vision of the artist and of the thinker who, since his youth, has contributed so much to the knowledge and analysis of the whole complex modern world.

There are in "South American Journey" observations which may wound the susceptibilities of some Americans, both of the North and of the South. But we approve of the candor of Waldo Frank because we are convinced that cando must be the base of true understanding between us. And to the true understanding no one else has contributed so much

REPORTS ON GERMANY WHICH COME FROM Berlin should naturally be taken with a bag of salt. When they come by way of Madrid, the prescription calls for a barrel. In the first instance they may be true and released by Dr. Goebbels simply because the facts can no longer be hidden; but when they appear to originate in Franco's servile press it is clear that they have been planted there in order to serve a purpose. It is with such justified suspicion that we read the tale of Adolf Hitler's noiseless fall from power and his replacement at the helm of the Third Reich by a triumvirate consisting of Field Marshal Keitel, Grand Admiral Doenitz, and Marshal Goering. The story first appeared in the Falangist paper Arriba, whose Berlin correspondent reports that Hitler and the Nazi party are being retained merely as a facade in order to prevent the kind of internal dissolution which accompanied the collapse of Mussolini in Italy. Why should the Germans want such a story to get about without at the same time taking responsibility for it? Without pretending to have the definitive answer, we can see two possible advantages. If the report is given wide credence it will increase the already dangerously prevalent assumption that the war, in Europe at least, is all but over. And it will be grist to the mill of those who have long hankered after a negotiated peace. If we were prepared to dicker with a Badoglio, the Goebbels theory might run, why not with a Keitel? If this is in fact the explanation, then Dr. Goebbels is slipping badly. The technique is as crude as the objective is wishful.

THERE IS SOMETHING ABOUT MASS MURDER which appears to elevate wanton killing from the level of crime to the realm of international politics. Upwards of a million innocent civilians have been systematically put to death by the German leaders admittedly because of their race. Hundreds of thousands more have been shot, gassed, or hanged as civilian hostages, contrary to every principle of international law. The enemy has bragged about these and equally monstrous crimes and held them up as a warning to other victims. Yet now that the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union have appealed to neutral governments not to give shelter to escaping war criminals, there is much talk about the right of asylum, as though these self-confessed murderers should by virtue of their defeat acquire the standing of political refugees fleeing persecution. Turkey is reported to be irritated over the alleged slight to its sovereignty, and the Swiss press takes so hostile a tone concerning the three-power démarche that Paul Ghali reports from Berne: "As one of my friends put it, 'The attitude of both Sweden and Switzerland seems most propitious for Hitler, Goering, and the rest.' " It is possible that the United Nations might have approached the neutrals more diplomatically; they might even have invited their participation in the conduct of the trials. Nevertheless, the neutrals will, for at least two reasons, be perpetrating a monstrous folly if they give refuge to war criminals merely to demonstrate their sovereignty. First, because failure to bring these men to justice in an orderly fashion will release the fury of the victim nations against all Germans and Italians, the innocent along with the guilty. And second, because by giving asylum the neutrals would draw down on their own heads the bitter hostility of their now tortured neighbors. What, for example, would be the relations between a free Norway and a Sweden which enabled Quisling to enjoy a comfortable old age?

THE CONNALLY-SMITH ACT HAS BACKFIRED. In its first test John L. Lewis, its supposed victim, clearly emerges as its chief beneficiary. Following a ruling by Attorney General Biddle that under the act minority groups possess the same right as majority groups to take a strike ballot, members of the United Mine Workers District 50 won a strike vote in the Allis-Chalmers plant in Springfield, Illinois. The vote automatically overturns a previous ballot in which a C. I. O. union had won the right to represent a majority of the employees in the plant, and opens the way to a possible strike in this important war plant early in September. The fact that the U. M. W. is the only important union in the country that does not consider itself bound by labor's post-Pearl Harbor anti-strike pledge makes the Connally-Smith bill a convenient weapon for Lewis in District 50's organizational drive in plants with established C. I. O. and A. F. of L. unions. Attorney General Biddle has been criticized for making an interpretation that so obviously plays into Lewis's hands. But in view of the rejection by Congress of an amendment that would have limited strike votes to majority groups, there can be little doubt that Biddle has accurately reflected the intent of Congress in his interpretation. It is the bill itself that is at fault. Obviously, Congress was more interested in embarrassing the Administration than in punishing Mr. Lewis.

THE HARLEM OUTBREAK WAS NOT A RACE riot: at no time was there fighting between Negro and white groups as there was in Los Angeles and Detroit. On that point there has been almost universal agreement among Negroes and whites. But to dismiss the affair as merely an example of hooliganism and vandalism is to dodge the issue completely. There is no question that rioters, hoodlums though they may have been, were protesting in their own way against the many discriminations which Negroes suffer, even in New York. The war has awakened a new sense of racial consciousness among Negroes all over the country, but in no place has it struck so deeply as in Harlem. The men who have been drafted from Harlem have been particularly outraged by the segregation and discrimination practiced in the army and navy, and their protests have fanned the already existing fires of discontent caused by job discrimination, bad housing, high rents, high prices, insufficient recreational and educational opportunities, and occasional police brutality. Under Mayor LaGuardia's personal supervision the police handled the outbreak with considerable effectiveness. But the long-range task of giving Harlem a fair share in the employment, education, health, and recreation facilities of the nation has not been met by city, state, or federal government. Until this is done, there will be constant danger of a repetition of last week's tragedy.

FRANK E. GANNETT, NEW YORK NEWSPAPER owner, Presidential aspirant, and eloquent defender of "freedom of the press," has started a campaign to kill "Under Cover," a book by John Roy Carlson which has been widely praised by reviewers as a painstaking exposure of Axis agents and fifth columnists in the United States. Although Mr. Gannett has declared that statements in the book about him personally and the Committee for Constitutional Government of which he is a trustee are "ignorantly or maliciously false, inaccurate, and grossly misleading, libelous, and seriously damaging," he has not, at the time of writing, taken the obvious legal remedy. Instead, the Committee for Constitutional Government, to which the book devotes considerable attention, has sent a notice to booksellers, radio stations, newspapers, and others warning of "probable liability for damages of those who participate in the distribution of the book." This threat has succeeded in scaring Baker and Taylor, the largest book wholesalers in the country, but fortunately the publishers of "Under Cover," E. P. Dutton and Company, are not only sticking to their guns but counter-attacking. They have issued a statement saying that the book was published only after "thorough investigation," that they do not intend to withdraw it, and that they are prepared to offer financial protection to booksellers. Elliott B. MacCrae, secretary-treasurer of the firm, spoke warmly of "attempted intimidation" in a press interview. This characterization of Gannett's effort to suppress a book without incurring the risks of legal action seems to us almost too mild.

"NOW THERE IS NO INHERENT REASON WHY a ballet dancer . . . cannot also be a good economic analyst," said the New York Times editorial. "The only important question is what kind of an economist Mr. Bovingdon is." The Times, we thought, is talking sense. Moreover, given its research facilities, it can find out in the twinkling of an edition what the cold facts are about Mr. Bovingdon's qualifications. So we hurried on. But did the Times point out that Mr. Bovingdon has a B.A. from Harvard and a Ph.D. in economics from Columbia University? That he speaks and reads Japanese, German, French, Spanish, and Russian, and that he once taught economics at Keio University in Tokyo? Not at all. Instead, it merely quoted an admittedly foolish remark Mr. Bovingdon made about dancing in 1924—people are likely to make foolish remarks about their hobbies. On the basis of that remark the Times accused him of having totalitarian tendencies. And the editorial ended by saying that somebody really ought to find out about Bovingdon's economic competence and his "present economic opinions." Surely the worst of dancers never put on a sillier performance than this pirouette by the Times. As for the incident itself—the firing of an apparently competent and useful government employee because he likes dancing and, it is whispered, has red leanings—it is only one more proof that Diesism is contagious.

GENERAL SMUTS OVERTHREW THE HERTZOG government in 1939 and took South Africa into the war with only a precarious margin of votes, and for nearly four years he has lived dangerously in the face of a powerful opposition dedicated to a policy of neutrality. Moreover, he has had to combat an undercover pro-fascist movement of somewhat formidable proportions which has preached sedition and practiced sabotage. Nevertheless, General Smuts has survived without resorting to dictatorial methods, and this summer, although he could have prolonged the life of Parliament, he chose to seek a new mandate. The decision was that of the stout believer in democracy; the timing revealed the astute politician. For the victories in North Africa, in which South African troops had played an important role, gave his United Party a very favorable electoral springboard. And at the same time the waning prestige of the Axis cooled the ardor of the pro-fascist elements. On July 7 unprecedented numbers of voters went to the polls, a large majority of them intent on "answering Zeesen"—the Nazi radio station which had filled the air with propaganda for the anti-war Reunited Nationalists led by Dr. D. F. Malan. The results, delayed by collecting and counting soldiers' votes, show that General Smuts has won a spectacular victory. The United Party, with its pro-war allies, the Labor and Dominion Parties, received a popular majority of two to one. Together they now have 107 members in a Parliament of 150. Dr. Malan's group, it is true, has held its own, but at the expense of the other anti-war groups, which have now been eliminated. Although the election was fought entirely on the war issue, its outcome means that South Africa will begin the tasks of peace under a leader who is a firm believer in international cooperation.

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD—WE NEVER GOT USED to thinking of him as Lord Wedgwood—was one of those "sports" who do much to redeem the general stuffiness of the British upper classes. Born into the industrial aristocracy, a direct descendant of the famous potter, he was a natural radical and spent his life fighting for the under dog. He entered politics as a liberal in the 1906 electoral sweep that brought Campbell-Bannerman to 10 Downing Street and inaugurated what then seemed a series of daring social reforms. After the last war, in which he served with distinction, he joined the Labor Party and held office in the first Labor government. But Wedgwood was never a man to pay too much attention to either party labels or party discipline, and while he adhered to the Socialist creed, he never ceased to be a rampant individualist. He was a man of many causes, and when these were assailed he was quick to take the counter-offensive no matter what opponents he might meet. Of recent years much of his energy had been given to Zionism, and on many occasions he vehemently attacked the British government for its failure to implement its promises to the Jews. Yet for all his belligerence Wedgwood will be mourned by men of every party, for his personal charm made friends of his political enemies. And above all he will be remembered as a representative House-of-Commons man who did much to maintain the great traditions of Parliament.

Mr. Crider's "Scoop"

FROM Washington comes the news flash that the Department of State is floundering about in a muddle of disorganization, internal rivalries, and cross-purposes. Few readers of The Nation will be jolted out of their chairs at this revelation, but what elevates the report into the man-bites-dog category of news is its source. Only a week ago Arthur Krock attributed the wave of criticism which has recently engulfed the State Department to "Communists and their fellow-travelers." And now along comes a simple but damning indictment written by one of his own subordinates and splashed on page one of his own New York Times.

The dispatch, by John H. Crider, tells of a report to the President by his administrative experts describing "conflicting personalities, lack of cohesive policy, and a resulting impairment of the efficiency of the Department of State at a time when it must assume tremendous burdens relating to the effectiveness of the coming peace." Diplomats are reported to be thoroughly bewildered by the conflicting views communicated to them by various department officials. Lack of direction on both French and Italian policy, as Mr. Bolles points out elsewhere in this issue, is glaringly apparent. And the situation has gotten so out of hand that one British diplomat, according to Crider, "recently asked a news correspondent if it was true that two of Secretary of State Cordell Hull's immediate assistants referred to the Secretary by use of an odious epithet."

It is no wonder that Crider's story brought Mr. Krock back from his vacation on the run. For years a faithful tub-thumper for Secretary Hull, Krock tried to repair the damage. Significantly, he did not attempt to refute the Crider story or the report of the President's administrative experts. On the contrary, he dismissed them as "common knowledge in the capital" (as though he had ever conceded the faintest suggestion that all was not harmony in the Department). Then falling back on a previously prepared line of defense, as the military analysts say, he attempted to turn the whole exposé against the President, holding him responsible for saddling Hull with unsympathetic assistants and for failing to dismiss Welles when it became apparent that he and Hull were at loggerheads.

Mr. Krock's detailed analysis seems to us to be full of holes and his own record of reporting on the subject disingenuous, but there is more than a shred of truth about his conclusion. Of course the President is responsible for his own State Department, and it is high time he did something about it. Our own recommendation would be to replace Secretary Hull, who has long demonstrated his incapacity either for administering the department or for evolving a foreign policy that has any relevance to the present state of the world. But we hardly regard such a move as probable in a pre-election year, considering Hull's extraordinary hold on the Southern Democrats.

The President's position is, in fact, an extremely delicate one, and even though the situation is partly of his own making he is entitled to sympathetic understanding. He can give the department the shake-up which is long overdue and run the political risks which such a move would certainly entail. Or he can return to his old policy of creating new and efficient agencies, which would drain off some of the functions of the State Department, at the risk of jurisdictional disputes and inter-agency rivalries. What seems to us utterly illogical, however, and in the long run impossible, is the course the President appears to have chosen. At a crucial diplomatic point in the war he has elected to repose full confidence in the State Department, placing in its hands economic as well as political weapons which in its present condition it is wholly incapable of handling. With this sudden accession of responsibility, the contradictions and dissensions which have long smoldered in the department are naturally rising to the surface. Once discernible only through the microscopes of "cranks" and "fellow-travelers," they are now visible to the naked eye of Arthur Krock.

There Is a Tide . . .

THERE is no means of telling, as we go to press, whether there is any basis for the numerous reports of a meeting between the President, Winston Churchill, and Stalin. But if such a meeting has not been arranged, it ought to be promptly. For the tide of victory is setting strongly toward the shores of the United Nations. The collapse of Mussolini, the capture of Orel and Belgorod, the fall of Catania, the obliteration of Hamburg, the growth of defeatism inside Fortress Europe—these are the surf-marks which show how rapidly the tide is rising. But are we prepared, in either a military or a political sense, to take it at the flood?

Ernest Lindley, an accepted mouthpiece of the Administration, answers this question in rather dismal fashion. "The European war," he says, "is moving almost too fast. . . . Paradoxically, it looks as if Mussolini's collapse came too soon. It might have served us better if it had come two or three months later when Allied armies were fully prepared to invade Italy and the Balkans, and possibly other portions of the European continent." If views of this kind have been transmitted to Moscow, it is not surprising that Russian demands for a second front now should have taken on a peremptory, almost angry tone. For there is no doubt that this is the psychological moment for an invasion of the continent which would strike much nearer the heart of our enemies than Sicily. With the Russian summer offensive developing growing power, with Hitler forced to hurry reserves to the Balkans and Italy, with the German home-front under obvious strain, the effect of a new blow in the west could be shattering.

But Mr. Lindley tells us, and we fear his authority is all too good, that we are not ready for such a move. It is a matter which it is impossible to argue about, as the relevant facts and figures cannot be published. But whatever may be the reasons for military unreadiness there can be no excuse for political delay in exploiting Mussolini's fall. For this was an event which could have been intelligently anticipated and for which political strategists should have been prepared. Unhappily, it took us by surprise and we have not yet decided how to exploit it. Our first, too hasty, assumption was that Badoglio had taken over the government with the intenion of pulling Italy out of the war on our terms—unconditional surrender. Therefore, the O. W. I.'s rude remarks about him were repudiated and he was approached with encouraging words while revolutionary developments in Italy were disparaged. It soon became clear, however, that Badoglio's role was that of salvage man for Italy's ruling classes and his idea of suitable peace terms the neutralization of Italy. This proposal seems to have the backing of the Vatican, and it would no doubt be as acceptable to Germany—to which it would afford cheap protection—as it must be unacceptable to us.

Finding that Badoglio has, in fact, nothing to offer and that his tactics are simply affording the Germans time to create a new line on the Po, we are now appealing over his head to the Italian people, and warning them that they must force the new Italian government to seek peace or suffer anew the horrors of bombardment. But how are the Italians to impress their will upon Rome? They can only resort to demonstrations, to strikes, to riots; in short, to actions which both Washington and London have frowned upon as making for anarchy. There was a revolutionary situation in embryo immediately after the fall of Mussolini. But we did nothing to encourage its growth, and while we wait for Badoglio to appear at Eisenhower's headquarters he busies himself in restoring internal "order."

The reception our troops have received in Sicily proves that potentially a large part of the Italian people are our friends. Properly approached, they could become our allies both in compelling the Italian government to come to terms and in ejecting the Nazis from Italy. Those are objectives they almost certainly share with us, but beyond peace and rupture of the Axis alliance the Italians want to be free of the kind of government which has brought them to their present plight. It is absurd to dismiss such arguments as introducing ideological irrelevancies. We can take full advantage of the tide which is washing away the ideas which created this war only if we have better ideas with which to replace them.

Plans for D-Day

THE Republicans, through Harrison Spangler, Chairman of the Republican National Committee, appear to have made another political blunder in their implied opposition to the demobilization program summarized in the President's radio address. Publication of the full report of the Conference on Post-War Readjustment of Civilian and Military Personnel makes it clear that the program the President outlined represents about the minimum that it is politically possible to do.

As contrasted with the planless demobilization of our 5,000,000 service men after the last war, the Conference's ninety-six recommendations represent a mildly encouraging approach to the problem. The period of demobilization is to be stretched out so as to tie in with the gradual conversion of the war industries to peacetime functions. A three-month "furlough" on pay will be given to men released from the forces, after which they are to be entitled to a maximum of six months' protection under unemployment insurance, plus the opportunity for a period of vocational training with pay.

Obviously, this is a far advance from the payment of a $60 bonus which was the sum total of the government's efforts after the last war. But we wonder whether it is going to appear to the average soldier as adequate compensation for the interruption of his civilian career. In money terms—and money is what the returned soldier is going to be needing—the proposals call for maximum assistance of about $690 for the transition period. Taking into account the World War bonus law—and the longer period of service in this conflict—the amount of cash assistance is actually less generous than that finally provided for overseas veterans of World War I. On the reasonable assumption that the transition is going to be much more severe than it was in 1919, and the extent of mass unemployment much greater, this program appears less than adequate to meet the hardships of the rehabilitation period.

Recognizing the limitations of any purely financial settlement of the country's debt to the servicemen, the conference rightly proposes an elaborate program of education, retraining, public works, and agricultural rehabilitation to aid the servicemen in finding their niche in civilian life. On our ability to translate these generalized proposals into concrete, practical terms our whole post-war program will stand or fall. Contrary to the general impression, however, no detailed plans in this direction have yet been formulated and, at the moment, there is no agency empowered to undertake this task. The killing of the National Resources Planning Board by Congress leaves the country without a civilian general staff to prepare a strategy for D-day.

It is not enough to say that educational facilities will be available for servicemen by the time they are demobilized. A huge program for retraining, involving millions of men, cannot be set up overnight. Unless the entire effort is placed under competent educational direction, it might easily become a gigantic boondoggling enterprise without educational value. The same applies to planning for post-war public works and agricultural resettlement. Immediate responsibility for seeing that provision is made for handling this job well in advance of the need rests, of course, with Congress. But we should like to see the President provide much more effective leadership in post-war planning than he has done to date. Concrete plans covering the technical aspects of demobilization should be a matter of public discussion and debate in the months to come. Only through this process shall we be able to meet the test when D-day arrives, whether it is in 1943 or 1949.

Foreign Policy Wanted

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, August 5

PRESSED by our allies overseas, the Administration at last seems to be moving haltingly toward some sort of recognition of the French Committee of National Liberation; by the time this article appears the grudging gesture may have been made.

The British government wants the committee recognized; the Soviet government wants it recognized; the members of the committee themselves have smoothed the way for recognition by making General de Gaulle the permanent president of a new Committee of National Defense and General Giraud, the darling of the Potomac, commander of the French fighting forces. The impossible arrangement by which the two generals held the same job is wiped out; with that arrangement perhaps will be wiped out our dismal policy toward the French.

Some frank talkers at the State Department itself are willing to grant in private conversation that the French policy has steered the United States into an impossible back alley in which we find ourselves irritably condemning a man whose strength, outside and inside France, grows daily. Despite every Washington effort to cozen, humiliate, and frustrate De Gaulle, he has emerged as the first Frenchman in the world. The State Department knows this and so does the department's chief prop at the White House on French affairs, Admiral Leahy.

The moves toward a change in American policy have all been conducted behind the scenes and back of the smoke screen of President Roosevelt's statement that after all 95 per cent of the French people are under the German heel. When the National Committee was reorganized, Secretary of State Hull would do no more than tell his press conference that the problem of recognition was a matter being studied from week to week and from day to day, though at that very moment he had a communication from the British government urging limited recognition. The full satisfaction of military requirements, which Mr. Hull has said time and again are paramount in the formulation of policy, actually requires recognition, so that the French in North Africa will be in a position to fit adequately into the war.

Washington's dilemma over French policy points up an extraordinary story given page-one prominence by the New York Times on August 4. The story, by John H. Crider, attributes to "administrative experts" the discovery that the State Department is inefficient and a breeding ground for dissension. Mr. Hull at once retorted that his department is efficient, but recent events suggest otherwise. We bungled on French policy badly when we played Giraud against De Gaulle. We had no policy of any kind ready when Mussolini gave up the ghost in Italy. We guessed wrong on Badoglio's intentions and gave continental Italy almost a week's respite from the pounding of war—not to mention giving the Germans an opportunity to entrench themselves north of the Po—while we waited for Badoglio to do what apparently he never intended to do, that is, sue for peace. United Nations diplomats here regard this not unnaturally as inefficiency of a major sort.

The Crider story, which shook Washington more vigorously than anything else in weeks, apparently had no ulterior meaning. It bore in many ways the marks of a hot-weather story and contained charges unaccompanied by specific detail. One detail it could have carried concerned our lack of planning for the proper economic exploitation of Sicily. Long ago the Board of Economic Warfare, before it was merged into the Office of Economic Warfare, prepared an elaborate program for American use of the agricultural economy of Sicily immediately following an Allied invasion. The State Department did not accept the program. The military in North Africa did not accept the program. We invaded Sicily without a program, and the result is the United Nations have had to plan long-range shipments of food into an island which, properly worked, could soon after the invasion have begun turning out large quantities of food. A V-mail letter reaching Washington today from a soldier in Sicily comments that besides cantaloupes he and his fellows are getting no Sicilian produce, nor is there prospect they will get any.

The decision announced here two days ago to send Wesley Sturges to Sicily as the State Department's economic representative suggests that perhaps the "administrative advisers" mentioned by Mr. Crider have some influence. Dr. Sturges was a BEW agent, and the BEW has been keener than the State Department in anticipating developments in foreign affairs. The lights burn late in the department; the staff men work long hours; but they grind their noses on the emery of immediate problems which obscure the greater issues, and the result is inefficiency when the major emergency arises. Mr. Hull is an unsinkable public official; but there is a large gap between Mr. Hull's political sagacity and the efficient management of the republic's foreign affairs.

The dissension in the State Department which Mr. Crider's informants referred to is an old and tragic story. It is tragic because it raises bureaucratic storms that render it impossible for the efficient men in the department to do their work as well as they might. The department was long divided into two camps over the question of whether we should appease Japan. It is riddled now by rivalry between supporters of Assistant Secretary Adolf Berle, Jr., and the friends of Assistant Secretary Dean Acheson. Both officials work on economic matters. Differences in the department particularly befuddle its approach to the intricate and important problems of international aviation after the war.

Dissension, duplication, and bureaucratic rivalries hamper the development of our foreign policy even beyond the State Department itself. I saw a disturbing number of instances on my recent visit in England. In London, representatives of the State Department, the BEW, and the military quarreled with each other during diplomatic conferences with the British. Ambassador Winant has known his decisions to be reversed when high British officials appealed to Harry Hopkins. The OEW is busy planning the choice of German targets for our bombers; the Office of Strategic Services is busy doing exactly the same thing. The day approaches when the diplomatic aspects of the war will be every bit as vital as the military. Friendly foreign diplomats here wonder how we will meet that phase of the war.

[Our regular Washington correspondent, I. F. Stone, is on vacation. His weekly letters will reappear with the issue of August 28.]

Understanding England

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

CEMENTING the war-time partnership between Britain and the United States for peace-time purposes is not the most difficult of the many steps which must be taken to achieve a stable and just world order, but it may be first in importance in the sense that, without it, other steps become impossible. It may be harder to bridge the ideological gulf between the Western world and Russia, or the racial gulf between the Western world and Asia. It may be still harder to check the pride and restrain the power of the dominant nations so that the smaller countries may have their due place in world organization. Yet the Anglo-American partnership remains first in order of importance.

This partnership is assumed to be comparatively easy of achievement because of the common language, cultural traditions, and democratic ideals which bind the two nations together. But it must be observed that relatives sometimes find a tolerable accord more difficult than strangers. Minor differences against the background of fundamental similarities sometimes offend the imagination more than wider differences which invite no odious comparisons. It would be easy to refute some misconceptions which Britons harbor about our American democracy in regard to these minor differences. But it will be more profitable to leave the correction of such misconceptions to those in Britain who know us well and to deal on our side primarily with American misconceptions of British life.

Of the two chief prejudices against Britain in the United States, one pertains to its domestic life and the other to its foreign policy. The divergence between the democratic achievements of the two countries is responsible for the first of these prejudices. The United States is socially a more democratic country than Britain and is frequently affronted by the more rigid class structure of British society and the concomitant class snobbishness. But Americans do not generally know that Britain is much more advanced than we in respect to political democracy. Our social equalitarianism is the fruit of a bourgeois democracy that was able to realize the equalitarian ideals of the eighteenth century upon a virgin continent, without accommodating them to the hierarchical structure of feudal society. Britain, on the other hand, represents a remarkable mixture of feudal and bourgeois traditions. It is the one nation of the Western world which was able to give effect to the democratic protest against feudalism without sacrificing some of the virtues of the older order.

Socially, the consequence of this transition is a system in which the classes are more sharply separated than among us. But the political consequence is that Britain still enjoys advantages which we ought to recognize more generously, not only for the sake of better understanding but also with the idea of seeking such advantages for ourselves.

The feudal tradition embodies a much more organic sense of the community than does the bourgeois world. A bourgeois society easily degenerates into warring private interests, each of which claims certain "inalienable rights." The sense of the community, on the other hand, is a highly developed aspect of feudalism. When unleavened by democratic ideals, as was the case in the Middle Ages, the spirit of noblesse oblige may find no better expression than the sentimental charities of a "lady bountiful." But when the best aspect of the feudal tradition is left as a factor in a functioning political democracy, as in Britain, a comparatively high degree of justice is achieved, for then the tension of competing interests and claims is tempered by a recognition of the final demands of the commonweal.

The difference between the patience of the British under war-time rationing and restrictions and the frequently sullen and sometimes open rebellion of various interest groups in this country is largely the difference between these two traditions. Furthermore, the British take political control of the economic process for granted, while a bourgeois democracy like our own still indulges in the illusion that it is possible for economic life to pursue an independent course. "Manchester" liberalism is practically dead in the land of its birth, but in our own country "liberal" reactionaries regard the political restraints upon economic life made necessary by a technical civilization in general, and by war-time requirements in particular, as a New Deal conspiracy against business. In Britain even privileged groups speak with enthusiasm of the fact that ration coupons are a new kind of money which relate expenditure to need. In my recent visit to Britain I frequently heard what I have never heard in America—an expression of the hope that rationing will continue after the war, on the ground that it is pleasant to eat one's food without the uneasy feeling that one is eating at the expense of someone else.

The political distance between the left-wing Tories and labor in Britain is less than between any Republican group and our New Dealers. British labor may rightly be resentful because the Beveridge plan has not been implemented; and it is certain that a real class debate must precede its final implementation. Nevertheless, the principles of the Beveridge Report have been accepted with a degree of unanimity unknown in our own country. The ideas of Quintin Hogg's group of radical Tories would make Mr. Spangler and the Republican reactionaries purple with rage. Even some of the more conservative Tories would be capable of shocking Mr. Spangler.

There is a certain peril in this degree of political solidarity among the British classes. It tends to obscure some of the basic property issues which must be solved before modern society achieves a real measure of justice. The feudal class system leaves its mark upon the laboring class by giving it an inferiority complex. The larger measure of social justice achieved under the British system adds a degree of political complacency to the sense of social inferiority. In consequence, labor lacks a strong will-to-power. It is hazardous for a stranger to prophesy in such matters; yet I will venture the guess that it will be a long time before labor in Britain controls the government completely. Meanwhile it will probably exact various concessions from conservative governments either by participation or by pressure from without.

This organic rather than rational conception of community relations has the further consequence of emphasizing historical forms of social growth. The British do not like logical systems of political thought. They are on the whole averse to perfectly consistent systems, whether political, philosophical, or theological. They believe in venturing step by step from one liberty to another, from one form of justice to a broader one. In periods of prosperity they speak with pride of this method of "muddling through," though they sometimes engage in self-castigations about it in periods of adversity. This penchant for gradual historical growth gives the British nation a much brighter prospect of a basically peaceful domestic future than we have. The tumults and crises of our political life will continue to astound our British partners, in peace as well as in war.

It must be observed, however, that the international problem of our day has become too revolutionary for this method of approach. It may, ordinarily, be a good thing to follow Pope's advice:

> Be not the first by whom the new are tried > Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

Yet there are crises in history, such as the present international situation, when the proponents of gradual historical growth may underestimate the degree of novelty in a new situation and thereby fail to take steps sufficiently daring and venturesome to meet the situation.

The British feel that subsequent history has justified their critical appraisal of Woodrow Wilson's rather too abstract approach to world problems, particularly in view of the fact that American "realists" completely negated the plans of world government projected by American "idealists." They are rather glad that the Roosevelt Administration seems to be following the British method of gradually enlarging, and building upon, the closer relations among nations that the war has forced upon us.

Upon this point it seems to me that neither American nor British policy is sufficiently daring for the crisis of our time. Woodrow Wilson's world plans may have been too abstract and the League may not have sufficiently exploited the partnerships which the war alliances had created. Yet the policies of the present do not go far enough. The many problems which must be solved, between Britain and America on the one hand and between the Anglo-Saxon powers and Russia on the other, could be solved more easily if a partnership on broad general lines were projected than they can be if every problem of military, political, and economic pooling is approached without the presupposition of an over-all partnership. Furthermore, there are no really thoroughgoing plans for the application of this pooled power in solving the problems of the Pacific or of the European continent. There is every indication that Russian, British, and American plans are at cross-purposes concerning these problems, in so far as there are any plans. It would be unjust to hold the historical and piecemeal approach of the British solely responsible for the defects of both British and American policy; but it is a fact that that policy is too conservative for a period that requires broad plans.

Space permits only the barest mention of the misunderstanding between Britain and America in respect to foreign policy. Underlying the difference is the fact that America's power is preponderantly economic, whereas Britain's is chiefly political. Ours is derived from our continental resources and our unrivaled power of industrial production, while Britain's rests on its vast imperial system. The friction between these two forms of power promises difficulties on every hand. Our greater production of airplanes and ships and Britain's greater number of air bases and harbors is one factor; possible conflict with British sovereignty in countries that produce rubber for the American market is another. Even the reconstruction of the European continent—which will require American credits, while the nearness of Britain and its probably closer tie with Russia will give it greater political authority on the Continent than we are either willing or able to exercise—presents the same possibility of friction between economic and political power.

In the immediate instance, this friction expresses itself in the tendency of liberals in Britain and America to be unduly conscious of the sins of the other country rather than of those of their own. The British left frequently speaks of American politics as if a reactionary triumph in this country were already a foregone conclusion. On the other hand, American liberalism tends to regard British "imperialism" as merely a system of exploitation—a judgment which not only disregards the very great democratic achievement embodied in the "Commonwealth" side of the British Empire, but also obscures some very real accomplishments in British colonial administration. At the opposite extreme are those British idealists who speak of the burdens of empire as if nothing but a sense of moral responsibility could prompt them to bear their imperial tasks. This kind of moralism is as far from the truth as an interpretation of empire which identifies it purely with economic exploitation.

Both Britons and Americans, in short, require more objective criteria for an estimate of imperial tasks and a criticism of imperial vices. Despite American criticism of British imperialism, we shall have to learn in time that power, once possessed, must be exercised; that its occasional misuse is no more grievous than an isolationist effort to disavow its responsibilities; that even the most responsible exercise of power is not free of imperial corruption; and that the danger of the exploitation of the weak by the strong can be overcome only by the gradual elaboration of the most careful political and moral restraints.

A closer relationship between the two Anglo-Saxon powers might reduce friction by preventing a clash between forms of power which ought to supplement each other in a world community of nations. Each people would do well to remember the universal taint of imperial exploitation which accompanies the exercise of power, whether political or economic, when either is tempted to accuse the other. We might, in that event, learn to repent of our own sins, rather than of those of our partner.

Let's Look at Labor

V. UNIONS, RESTRICTED CLIENTELE

BY HERBERT R. NORTHRUP

AMERICAN trade unions have met the problem of organizing Negroes in a variety of ways. A desire to monopolize the market for their members' skill, together with race prejudice, has induced some craft unions to adopt the color bar. Fifteen such organizations still exclude Negroes by explicit provision in their constitutions or rituals. Six of these are small and relatively unimportant, but the other nine—the Machinists, the Commercial Telegraphers, the Railroad Telegraphers, the Railway Mail Association, and the Switchmen (all A. F. of L. affiliates); and the Locomotive Engineers, the Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Railway Conductors, and the Railroad Trainmen (the independent railroad brotherhoods)—include some of the most powerful unions in this country. Five other unions—the Plumbers and Steamfitters, the Electrical Workers, the Asbestos Workers, the Flint Glass Workers, and the Granite Cutters (all A. F. of L. affiliates)—have no rules restricting the admission of Negroes, but their locals generally exclude them by tacit consent. In addition, nine organizations—the Boilermakers and Shipbuilders, the Maintenance of Way Employees, the Railway Carmen, the Railway Clerks, the Blacksmiths, the Sheet Metal Workers, and the Federation of Rural Letter Carriers (of the A. F. of L.) and the Rural Letter Carriers' Association and the American Federation of Railroad Workers (both independent)—confine Negroes to Jim Crow "auxiliaries" which permit them to pay dues but in one way or another deny them a voice in union affairs or an opportunity for occupational advancement.

Some craft unions, for example the Bricklayers and the Plasterers, both of the A. F. of L., have attempted to insure Negroes equality both in the union and on the job. The large number of Negroes in the trowel trades undoubtedly was an important factor in inducing these organizations to adopt such a policy. In addition, unions having jurisdiction over unskilled workers, like the A. F. of L. Hod Carriers and Common Laborers, and those organized on an industrial basis, like the A. F. of L. Ladies' Garment Workers and the unions affiliated with the C. I. O., generally admit Negroes on an equal basis.

Officially, the American Federation of Labor opposes race discrimination without reservation. Actually, it has condoned it in all its forms. Since 1895, it has not once refused affiliation to an organization because it excluded Negroes. On several occasions it organized Negroes into directly affiliated "federal" locals because a constituent union barred them. Then, when the union in question amended its rules so as to admit Negroes to a Jim Crow "auxiliary," the A. F. of L. Executive Council revoked the Negroes' federal charters and forced them to accept an inferior status in the local union.

On the other hand, no national union affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations bars colored workers or confines them to separate locals. Since the C. I. O. was founded by leaders of the Mine Workers and the garment unions, which have long had as liberal racial policies as any unions; since it is committed to a "take in everybody" philosophy, and indeed had to do just that if it wished to organize the mass production industries; and since it contains within its ranks most of the left-wing groups in the labor movement, its opposition to discrimination is not difficult to understand.

Of the twenty-nine unions which by explicit provision or tacit consent either exclude Negroes or afford them only inferior status, thirteen are found on the railroads and six more in railway shops. In no other industry has collective bargaining been so unprofitable for Negroes. Management has denied colored railroad workers promotion and paid them less than whites for performing identical jobs, a fact which is often hidden by classifying Negroes and whites doing the same work under different titles. Rather than admit Negroes and bring their standards up to those of the white workers, two railway brotherhoods, the Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and the Railroad Trainmen, have attempted for more than fifty years to drive Negro firemen and brakemen off the Southern roads, where nearly all of them are employed. Both appear about to succeed. The Locomotive Firemen signed a contract with most of the Southern railroads in February, 1941, which has the effect of prohibiting the employment of Negroes on engines with Diesel motors or automatic stokers. Under an Interstate Commerce Commission ruling automatic stokers were required to replace hand firing on nearly all steam engines by July 1, 1943.

The Railroad Trainmen have made use of the National Railroad Adjustment Board to achieve their goal. This unique administrative agency was set up by the Railway Labor Act of 1934 as a final court for disputes arising out of the interpretation of collective agreements in the railway industry. It is a bi-partisan board composed of management and the standard railway-union representatives, who deny other interested parties a hearing. It has enunciated the principle (with referee sitting in and employer members dissenting) that a particular job "belongs to" a particular class of men. Accordingly, since Negroes who perform brakemen's jobs are usually classified as "porter-brakemen," they have no "right" to such work, even if a railroad has always hired Negroes, and never whites! On April 20, 1942, the First Division of the Adjustment Board (Award No. 6,640) ruled exactly this way. Vigorously dissenting, the employer members declared that this "award seriously transgresses our authority and duty," and demanded a federal investigation. Congress would do well not only to follow this suggestion, but to investigate also the relationship between the racial policies of the railroad unions, particularly the Locomotive Firemen, and the current shortage of labor.

Such an investigation was planned by the Committee on Fair Employment Practices set up by President Roosevelt in June, 1941. The committee had succeeded in opening up employment opportunities to Negroes in many plants which had barred them. But about two weeks before the railroad hearings were to be held—and two days after the President left for the Casablanca conference—Paul V. McNutt, War Manpower Commissioner, into whose agency the committee had been shifted a few months before, called off the railroad hearings. Recently a new committee headed by Father Francis J. Haas has been appointed and the railroad hearings rescheduled for September 15-16. But whether the committee can do more than embarrass the railroad unions by publicizing the sordid details of their policy remains to be seen. In the meantime, the Negro firemen and brakemen, among the highest paid colored workers in the country, continue to be deprived of jobs.

The exclusionist union which carries the greatest threat to the economic future of colored workers is not the Locomotive Firemen or the Railroad Trainmen, but the International Association of Machinists, which recently left the A. F. of L. Founded by railway shopmen in Atlanta, it now has a membership of 500,000, sprawled all over the economy in railway and machine shops, shipyards, and more recently in airplane plants, in which the A. F. of L. has given it exclusive jurisdiction. Had it won collective bargaining rights for most of the aircraft industry, it would have helped to institutionalize the almost universal prejudice which management in this industry exhibited toward Negroes before the war. Fortunately, the equalitarian-minded Auto Workers (C. I. O.) have been more successful in this field. Moreover, the FEPC has forced the Machinists to permit Negroes to work in some of the plants in which they have agreements. Nevertheless, the employment of Negroes in this great industry of the future continues to be small, and the Machinists' union remains a threat to further industrial gains of Negroes wherever it is entrenched.

A few locals of the Machinists have actually admitted Negroes in disregard of the exclusionist clause in their union ritual. Whether this is a sign of reform or a temporary expedient remains to be seen. But until the exclusionist clause is removed, permanent reform is scarcely possible.

For a union to practice equality of treatment, not only must it admit colored workers on an equal basis; it must also insist that jobs be divided without regard to race, and that lay-offs, rehirings, and promotions be based upon some principle, such as seniority or ability or some combination of the two, which does not permit discrimination. The promotion problem has come to the fore during the war boom and has been responsible for much friction. White workers, in many instances, have resented the introduction of Negroes into jobs which they regarded as strictly their property. On the other hand, Negroes have justly pointed out that real equality means equal treatment in all phases of the collective agreement. By and large, union officials have backed up the Negroes since the war. It was upon the insistence of the C. I. O. Auto Workers that Negro janitors and foundry workers in the automobile industry were up-graded and trained for jobs in the Detroit factories that have been converted to tank and airplane production. Although harassed by some wild-cat strikes by prejudiced whites, the top officials of this union have not compromised their stand.

The A. F. of L. Ladies' Garment Workers, and such C. I. O. unions as the Steelworkers, the Aluminum Workers, the Electrical, Radio, and Machinery Workers, and the Marine and Shipbuilding Workers have taken a position as firm as that of the Auto Workers in so far as non-discriminatory promotions are concerned. In addition, the last two, together with the C. I. O. National Maritime Union, have played a major role in inducing employers who had never hired Negroes to accept them for the first time.

But equalitarian-minded unions have had little success in opening up the higher-bracket jobs to Negroes in the South. Constantly on the defensive in this area, they have hesitated to make a frontal attack on the custom of reserving the better jobs for whites. Besides, too frequently unions desirous of giving Negroes equal treatment have found it necessary to go slowly lest they induce the majority of white workers to shift to an organization which is not committed to a non-discrimination policy. Thus, while in many instances the split in the labor movement and the rise of the new industrial unions have forced older organizations to liberalize their racial policies, too often the lack of a united front has compelled the equalitarian ones to backtrack on their principles.

Despite the failure of unions to revolutionize hiring and promotion practices in the South and despite the activities of such organizations as the railroad brotherhoods and the Machinists, unions are today far more of a help than a hindrance to Negro workers. A great part, perhaps even a majority, of the gains made by Negroes in industry during the last few years can be attributed to union influence. During all their years of unrestricted control, few American employers made any real attempt to give Negroes a square deal in so far as hiring and promotion were concerned. Their excuse was that the white workers would not stand for it. Often this was the case. Yet it has been the unions that have forced management to accept and to promote Negroes, and the union leaders who have kept the protests of prejudiced whites from getting out of hand. In view of the fact that a majority of the discriminatory unions are confined to a few industries, especially railroading, it is likely that organized labor will continue to be a boon to Negroes.

On the other hand, there does not seem to be much hope that the unions which have discriminatory rules will abolish them in the near future. To be sure, there is a minority in most of these organizations which has long advocated just that. But after diligent research, I can report only one union, the A. F. of L. Hotel and Restaurant Employees, which has completely removed the restrictions against colored workers that were once in its laws. The unwarranted emphasis by the armed forces on Jim Crow and the virulent racism that is sweeping the country are likely to retard progress after the war. Certainly there is a crying need for education, not only of the rank and file, but of some union leaders as well.

[This is the fifth article of a series of seven on the problems confronting the American labor movement. The sixth will appear in two weeks.]

Jack Raper—Batting for Scripps

BY DEXTER HOYT TEED

SINCE the death of E. W. Scripps, founder of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, the liberal, crusading organization he created has degenerated to a pale and weak conservatism. But there is one man who carries the torch for "E. W.," fighting uncompromisingly for the ideals Scripps advocated during his flamboyant life.

This man is a fragile, seventy-three-year-old little Clevelander who until he speaks looks as if he might be a Mr. Milquetoast of the eighteen-nineties. When he bends his gaze upon a listener, however, and speaks his mind, his quality becomes clear. He is, of course, Jack Raper of the Cleveland Press. Though he has never become nationally known, the men with whom he works swear by him and insist, with a catch in their throats, that he is the answer to a newspaperman's prayer and that if there is a last journalist it is he.

Raper expects to retire at the end of this year, after serving for forty-three years as an absolutely independent columnist on the paper that Scripps founded as the Penny Press back in the days when nearly every newspaper was the tool of some pressure group, political party, or financial interest. He has not become rich except in the love that other newspapermen, grateful citizens, and those he has helped have bestowed upon him.

Jack Raper knew E. W. Scripps as well as he knew his own mother. He will tell you about him today. "That old bastard!" he will say affectionately. "He drank more whiskey than any man I ever knew, but he was so damnably honest and independent that he makes some of these modern journalists who are out for the almighty dollar look like pigmies. E. W. never owned a block of stock, he was never tied up with any banks, and nobody ever influenced his editorial policy. Of course the Press is bigger and more successful financially than it ever was when Scripps was living, but if he controlled it today, the paper would be a stronger editorial force, crooks and shysters who now sometimes get away with murder would be put in a fitting place, and we'd have a better world to live in."

There was a tradition of honest, liberal, and progressive journalism in Cleveland. The Press continued it. And in Scripps's early days it began to spread over the country. The Scripps policy was not only good American doctrine; it was also good business. Scripps never suffered serious financial difficulties. The money rolled in and E. W. prospered. Raper found his place on the Press, after wandering around the country as a journeyman newspaperman, all the time moved by ideals that were strange in an era when every American boy believed that if he were smart enough he could become a multimillionaire or President.

To understand the Raper of today it is necessary to know his background. He has written of it picturesquely:

> Beginning at the beginning, I was born in McArthur, a town or the town in Vinton County, the hickest county > in the state of Ohio, but no hicker than I am, for notwithstanding the fact that I have spent two-thirds of my life in fairly large cities I am a hick, afraid of crowds, street cars, automobiles, traffic cops, head waiters, hat checkers, bootleggers, uplifters, aluminum collars, and hard-boiled shirts, and I shave myself with an old-fashioned straight razor—a hick without a single sign of evolution into an urban.

Young Jack's father wanted him to be a professional man, but Jack ran away from home and got into the newspaper business by the back door. He has never been out of it. Some may say that Raper has been a rare exception in journalism, but that is not so. He caught the spirit of journalism as a youngster and despite pressure from every direction has never forgotten it.

With such a background Raper in recent years has had to face the fact that the Scripps-Howard outlook has changed. Fortunately the Press has a gifted editor—in the opinion of many persons the ablest editor in the Scripps-Howard chain. Back in 1928 Louis Seltzer was a "boy editor"; today, a grandfather at forty-five, he is an editorial and political force in the Middle West. Formerly a successful reporter, Seltzer has the knack of humanizing the news.

When the non-Scripps influence descended upon Scripps-Howard, Raper still had a chance under Seltzer to function as an independent thinker. True, Roy Howard had said bluntly that the need for pro-labor liberal journalism was over. The slogan, "Give light and the people will find their own way," still stood, but it had been nullified by Howard's statement, when he returned from Russia, that "the people" were receiving too much information. The Scripps influence was dead as a moving force behind Scripps-Howard journalism. Under the circumstances Jack Raper might have been expected to suffer an eclipse. But he just isn't that kind of person. Seltzer put no brakes on his column, although the Press's editorials became more and more conservative. A. T. Birch and John Markham, who wrote them, did not find it difficult to follow the Howard line.

Raper has often directly opposed the editorial policy of the paper. The Press was against the city's purchase of the immensely profitable Cleveland Illuminating Company. Raper came out strongly for it. He didn't pull any punches either. He presented facts and proved to many that taxes would be reduced substantially by the purchase and that the city as a whole would benefit. Raper lost that fight, but it didn't discourage him. While editorials were catering more and more to big corporations, Raper still had a feeling for the little man.

Frequent digs at the people and the causes the paper supported have appeared in his column. For example: "Take this for a guide: whenever the big boys are against anything, it is certain to be pretty good for the masses." "I suppose God had some reason for putting bankers here. He made the boll weevil and the corn borer also." "Washington is noting that Governor Bricker is playing the silent game just as Hoover and Coolidge did. And for the same reason those two played it. They couldn't think of anything to say." "Some awful big men can crawl into some mighty small holes." "What this world needs is more open minds and fewer open mouths."

When the Press bears down on labor, Raper rises to defend it. He has fired some of his best verbal broadsides at Eddie Rickenbacker.

Often referring in his column to "my esteemed contemp, the Cleveland Press," he tears apart some of its best editorial arguments. Sometimes he uses ridicule, sometimes facts. In one of his many speeches he used the tongue-in-the-cheek method. "Certainly I'm not anti-Press," he said, "though I am occasionally irritated by the knowledge that I must be careful not to send the editor to jail. But, speaking to you privately and confidentially, I wish now and then that the editor was in jail." Some wondered whether he was referring to Seltzer or Roy Howard.

Seltzer has cannily utilized Raper's forthright liberalism to retain liberal readers antagonized by the change in editorial policy. Seltzer even added to his staff Dilworth Lupton, who writes in a liberal vein but is not averse to compromise. The prestige of Raper's outspoken column has been increased by the contrast.

For months Raper has been a two-fisted critic of Frederick C. Crawford, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. He has objected to both his outlook and his ideas. Seltzer, a man who by nature likes peace in the human family, one day asked Raper to attend a luncheon with him and "meet a friend." Raper became suspicious and asked Seltzer who the friend was. When he learned it was Crawford, he said bluntly, "Louis, I don't want to meet him today, tomorrow, or ten years from today. He isn't my kind and you know it."

Of all the Scripps-Howard papers, the Cleveland Press is the most successful. It makes approximately one million dollars a year. Raper is undoubtedly one of the main reasons, for he gives the reading public the straight-from-the-shoulder opinions to which Scripps had accustomed it. Louis Adamic once called him Cleveland's most successful citizen. The late Martin B. Daley, for years an important figure in Cleveland, said of him: "When clashes occurred between the city and the gas company on the ancient question of rates, five words by Raper could do more harm than five pages of costly advertising could repair." Several times people have tried to persuade him to syndicate his column nationally, but he has insisted he wants to write for Cleveland and Cleveland people. "You can't see very good when the spotlight's turned on you," he wrote once in his column—and he may have been thinking of himself.

Raper is probably a rather ordinary human being who has used what talents he had and refused to compromise. A spare little man, friendly and chuckling, he moves spryly through the world, pausing to deflate the egos of stuffed shirts, bombastic politicians, and self-seeking crooks. He is invariably cheerful and hopeful while trying doggedly to make people a little more honest and a little more considerate of others. If he appears cynical at times, his cynicism is a fraud. Actually he is warm-hearted and impish. Like the average man that he is, he is skeptical of bigness and "big men." This may be his weakness, but it is a good weakness in an era when many newspapermen have discovered that catering to bigness is the surest way of obtaining financial rewards.

Raper has been surprisingly popular among those who disagree completely with his views. If he speaks before a Rotary Club, he is likely to select a subject such as Jesse James and Other Bank Robbers and then upbraid the bankers for their shortcomings. But he gets their applause. He was the first important Cleveland citizen to denounce the Van Sweringens' top-heavy financial empire. His speech on that subject before the City Club is still recalled as a classic. He described the light that burned in the Cleveland Terminal Tower built by the Van Sweringens, and closed with these words: "There in the tower top it burns, night after night, in memory of the Unknown Bondholder. And there they sit, the unkissed cherubs, symbols of the sublimity of virginity and masculinity. Pure in their private lives. But it can hardly be said that in their relations with the public they practiced continence."

He believes we will win this war and that the American tradition of liberty will be maintained, but some of the things that are happening now irk him. He wrote recently: "A letter-to-Santa-Claus contest conducted at Luke Field, Arizona, was won by a private who said: 'I have always voted the Republican ticket and read the funny papers on Sunday.' Death on the field of battle can hold no terror for such a man."

Raper is annoyed by the caution that has come over the Scripps-Howard chain and even the Press. When young Charles Scripps, grandson of E. W., was working on the paper, Raper detected in him a natural leaning toward liberalism and hoped that eventually Charles would be able to reestablish the liberal tradition. But young Scripps went into service soon after the war started. Raper also had hopes of Jack Howard, son of Roy, but Jack is in the navy now.

Raper cannot be wholly happy on a paper that almost invariably is on the side of privilege, that prints editorials written at Scripps-Howard central headquarters, and that allows its sports editor, after the manner of Lucius Beebe, to call the public "peasants." But Raper will be independent to the end. It's his nature, and he will never forget or betray the memory of Scripps.

In the Wind

THE PROPAGANDA BROADCASTS of Robert H. Best, American traitor, on the Berlin radio are now followed by this announcement: "The commentaries by Robert H. Best are his own and do not necessarily represent the views of this station."

SHOWING of the Negro movie, "Cabin in the Sky," at the Maury Theater in Mount Pleasant, Tennessee, was halted half an hour after it opened. A mob gathered in front of the theater and its leader ordered the manager of the theater to stop the showing. The manager went to the sheriff and asked what he should do. The sheriff advised him to obey the mob.

THE POLITICAL VALUES of the Norman, Oklahoma, Daily Oklahoman are revealed in two editorials published the same day. On Mussolini: "If he had died before he sent his soldiers to invade Abyssinia, he would have ranked in future history with those who served wisely and patriotically and well." On Henry Wallace's Detroit speech denouncing fascism: "While Americans died in Sicily, Henry Wallace talked politics."

ANTI-JAPANESE SENTIMENT on the West Coast is being used by an outfit called the Home Front Commandos, Inc., to promote drastic anti-alien legislation. One of its leaflets advises immediate action, because "the Pacifists, the Sob Sisters, the Religious Cliques, and the Brotherly Love gang will frustrate anything that may be attempted when peace comes. Now is the time to prepare for the Peace-Time War."

EXEGESIS: Editor and Publisher interprets Westbrook Pegler's position for the press: "Pegler is not against unionism. As a matter of fact, he is for it. He expressed great concern that the reaction that might take place with a change of administration in 1944 will go too far against unionism and might tend to build up a fascist organization."

AN ITALIAN underground organization, Justice and Liberty, has recently sent a group of members from its United States branch to Italy, "to continue . . . their fight in the heart of the struggle."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Nazi propaganda office in Brussels arranged for a captured Russian tank to be driven through the streets. The Brusselers covered it with flowers. . . . A Nazi paper in Lodz, Poland, urges German residents to wear their racial insignia as a "gesture of courage." "Whoever wears the German sign proclaiming his German nationality proves that he does not wish to be lost in the crowd."

Perplexities of Peace

BY JOSEPH CHAPIRO

IT SEEMS that we know less about the principle of world peace than about how to colonize Mars. "All your misfortunes have not taught you," cried the great French author and preacher Fénelon to the peoples of Europe 250 years ago, "what you must do to banish war." The truth of what he said is confirmed for us daily through the flesh of our sons, if not our own.

Certainly, none of the democratic peoples wanted this war. They made great sacrifices to avoid it. Nevertheless, they were drawn into war, one after the other, by a stronger, undemocratic nation, not because the democratic principle was a failure, or because the peoples adhering to it were betrayed by their governments, but because their statesmen and politicians did not understand the completely new principle of the modern world. A single people can unleash world war. But world peace can be secured only by all the peoples together. That is the lesson of the period between two wars.

The question is, therefore, how do our statesmen intend to apply this lesson and to secure world peace?

It is strange that in spite of the radio and in spite of official propaganda, we hear nothing about their intentions. No official peace program has been announced or even proposed for discussion. True, there is the Atlantic Charter, which was signed by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill a few months before the United States entered the war. The Charter, however, is but an ethical document, a creed of peace—not in any sense a program. In Moscow, Stalin has addressed some heart-warming messages to the heroic Red Army, but they served to enlighten us about the sentiments of the fighting Russians toward the German people rather than to formulate a peace program for the world. Nor have all the proclamations of the various governments in exile done more. They have been concerned chiefly with the restoration of the sovereignty of countries now under the Nazi yoke.

At the time of the Brest-Litovsk negotiations, that is, less than forty months after the outbreak of the First World War, I was able to publish outlines of twenty-four official peace programs sponsored by the warring powers, programs which basically resembled each other and therefore, at least theoretically, made the continuation of the war an absurdity. Whether those programs were good or bad, they existed. Today, after forty-seven months of war, no sign of a program has appeared.

In the last 150 years, the human spirit has attained undreamed-of heights in all fields except one—that of international politics. But this field, more than any other, rules the fate of collective humanity and of our individual existence. While all other forms of mental activity fructify one another, give and take from one another whatever is creative and challenging, international politics has taken from the inventions, the discoveries, the creations of our civilization only what is destructive, only what contributes to its own retrogression.

The most wonderful thing about the creations of the human spirit is that they fall into a pattern. Thus we are continually adding to the intellectual and spiritual riches which constitute our civilization. But in international politics nothing has been permanent. As the years have passed, each new conquest, for which a higher and higher price has been paid, has had a briefer and briefer existence. For centuries conquests, and the resultant political power of the conquerors, have lasted no longer than a few decades. The work of Charles V, Louis XIV, Napoleon, Bismarck—to name the greatest of them—endured only a bare fifty years. This astonishing phenomenon may be explained by the fact that the statesmen drew their wisdom for the future not from the continuous organic changes of the world but from the past. They let themselves be guided by history, which proved to be a machine running out of gear, a machine which so far has not been able to produce a body of principles that would enable us to establish a future more secure than the bloody past.

History records clamorous events that for the moment shake the world and a few decades later disappear without trace. It seldom records such phenomena as the triumph of steam with all its consequences, the natural development of a unified economy, or the slow victory of electricity. It lingers happily over Napoleon but scarcely mentions Ampère—perhaps because Ampère's triumph was not sealed by a treaty. But Napoleon's work vanished long ago, while electricity in the past 150 years has encircled the world with an external nervous system of such importance that all other systems have had to be quickly adapted to it. Animals which are transported to different living and climatic conditions must adapt their bodily functions to the new conditions or die. Politically we are in the same situation as those animals. The world today is no longer the one in which we thought we lived, and the failure to appreciate that fact has been leading Europe to its ruin.

THE VATICAN SPEAKS

The following quotations are taken from a Rome shortwave broadcast to Spain, picked up by the C. B. S. Shortwave Listening Station in New York on August 3, 1943.

Turin: Cardinal Maurelio Orsatti, Archbishop of Turin, has addressed a most noble pastoral letter to his followers in which he says among other things: "Today our august sovereign has placed the government in the firm hands of a caudillo who has demonstrated with facts that he is working only for the good of the fatherland. This is a formidable mission that he has accepted by reason of high duty. We must have faith in him and in his collaborators. It is a crime against the fatherland to interfere with his work in any way, even by criticism. The first measures adopted, as reported by the Italian press, show that the government desires to give the citizens that liberty which all were expecting. But liberty does not mean doing whatever one wishes to do. In fact, we must prove ourselves worthy of this liberty."

Genoa: Throughout all the churches of the Diocese of Genoa, the priests have read a pastoral letter by Cardinal Archbishop Boetto, in which he recalls that the duty of all Christians is to humble themselves to the new legitimately constituted authority with a spirit of comprehension, obedience, and discipline:

"No Christian must associate himself with any demonstrations of political ideas or programs of which he knows little; that is, programs or ideas which don't appear to respect institutions and natural rights. Prayer—the religious institution of the nation—participation at Holy Mass and the other sacraments, modesty in one's habits and ways, generosity and diligence are necessary, especially during these critical days, so that God may show the guiding light to the rulers and give our fatherland prosperity and the spirit of fraternity and of peace in the community of human beings."

The scale of political thinking has changed, and we can no longer work with dimensions which are microscopic in comparison with cosmic, indivisible reality. Scarcely a hundred years ago people in European capitals took no notice of what was happening in Shanghai or in any other distant spot on the earth. Today everyone feels instinctively, without being able to explain why, that any event, however distant, may have fateful consequences for his own country. Nevertheless, since the First World War our statesmen have used an archaic vocabulary, offered us banalities that in no other field of human endeavor would have received the slightest consideration.

I do not believe that the leading statesmen and party leaders of democratic Europe have lacked good will. Our leaders have simply lacked the chief necessity—global vision; and because they have lacked it for two decades, Europe and the world have been plunged into chaos. The democratic statesmen knew that the collapse of the League of Nations, the rearmament of Germany, the conquest of Ethiopia, the murder of the Spanish Republic, the Japanese invasion of China, the rape of Austria and Czechoslovakia, all accompanied by the uninterrupted slaughter of Jews, foretold coming global catastrophe. But they did not know how to organize the world to escape that catastrophe. The greatest calamity of all was that they were not even aware of their ignorance.

Wilson was the first statesman in modern times to think in a cosmic way and to see the world as an entity. He had the world view even before Versailles. When I visited Eamon de Valera in Dublin in 1934, I met a member of the Irish delegation that had been sent to Wilson in Paris in the spring of 1919. He related an episode to me which throws a bright light on the origin of the present tragedy. As the members of the Irish delegation questioned the American President, his replies became weaker and weaker. When they called his attention to the contradictions in what he said, Wilson fell back exhausted into an armchair and in a low voice confessed that if he wanted to keep all his promises and put his original program into effect he would have to send a new army overseas and wage war against all Europe, and of course the American people would never consent to that. This avowal of complete bankruptcy affected the delegation like the announcement of the Apocalypse. As Wilson took leave of his horrified guests, he could only whisper brokenly, "Did you really imagine that I was in a position to make over the world with one stroke? I came here with great hopes. I hoped to accomplish so many things that I have not been able to accomplish . . ."

Our leaders are perplexed, and that in itself is a step forward. In 1919 the old men gathered at Versailles thought they had the remedy in their hands, and they brought Europe to the verge of ruin. In 1943, our leading statesmen are convinced that we are far from possessing the remedy that will save the world, and they are unwilling to dispense the wrong medicine. That is the way I explain the absence of any official peace program. But the best of them know that economically the earth is a single unit and that peace likewise, as the Russians insist, is indivisible. They are groping for the common denominator which will permanently establish a new international system, based upon foundations of mutual trust and constructive idealism. They will find it only if their vision encompasses the whole terrestrial globe, and the political as well as the economic unity of its peoples. If not, Fénelon's cry will be heard again, this time with a violence that no one can foresee.

BY ARGUS

THE eruption of Rome filled Goebbels's ministry with consternation and confusion. By the time these ines appear in print much more water will have flowed down the Tiber, but a glance back at the first convulsions n the German political-dope factory will be instructive. Here is a calendar:

Sunday, July 25: Mussolini's "resignation" is proclaimed in Rome in the afternoon. Berlin doesn't mention it. But all the regular "political reviews" are omitted from the day's radio schedule, without explanation.

Monday, July 26: The bulletin from Rome is read to he radio audience for the first time—before dawn, at 3:37 a.m. Each reading is followed by the explanation, 'It is assumed that this change in government is due to the state of Il Duce's health." This, tirelessly repeated, s the only information available all day from radio or newspaper. In the evening comes Badoglio's proclamation that Italy will stay in the war, with a German admonition at the end: "Let the German people take due note of this declaration."

Tuesday, July 27: During the morning hours no further news of any kind from Italy. Only an effort to make this "internal Italian affair" seem unimportant for Germany. The Berlin Börsenzeitung, for example:

> The meaning of the Marshal's words is unmistakably clear, in spite of absurd and calumnious speculations by certain pro-British neutral papers which are casting doubt on Italy's honor.

At noon, however, comes the radio commentator Dr. Kriegk with vague hints that possibly everything may not be settled:

> The new development in Italy will cut deeply into the structure of Italian political life. We await developments in the political theater of war with complete calm.

And evidently orders have gone out not to use the word 'Axis" any more. The word "Axis" has disappeared from the German vocabulary! No more concrete news. Nothing about the dissolution of the Fascist Party. Nothng about Mussolini, the King, Badoglio, Gayda, Farinacci, etc. Not a word about unrest, demonstrations, fighting.

Wednesday, July 28: Still nothing about the dissolution of the Fascist Party or other developments. Life in Italy is "normal." Only "a few incidents" (those three words, nothing more) have occurred. But it is necessary o explain the lack of news. This is taken care of on the radio by the dark words of Fritz Lucke:

> It is only natural that the German people are waiting with obvious impatience for every piece of information from and about Italy, whose fate particularly concerns us Germans. The German leaders are fully aware of this. But the German leaders know also that such a German statement is nowhere more feverishly awaited than in our enemy's camp. The reason is clear: it is hoped that some very slight German comment will make it possible to draw conclusions about the next German move. For this reason the German leaders maintain silence.

Thus for the first time it is revealed that some sort of "moves" have become necessary. The point is underscored: "It is for the German leaders to determine when the day of action will come." "Brave hearts and cool heads" are commended to the public. By this time it is clear that we have wandered pretty far from the subject of Il Duce's health.

Thursday, July 29: Still no word on the dissolution of the Fascist Party, etc. But Mussolini is suddenly discovered. The principal theme for today is his sixtieth birthday. He is, it appears, a grand old man in momentary and honorable seclusion, still the revered hero of his people. The Völkische Beobachter greets him as a "man of the century." And the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung carries the eulogy still further:

> After our victory future generations will venerate in the remarkable personality of Mussolini a great revolutionary who advanced the goal not only for his own people but for the renewal of mankind.

Hitler's gift to his great friend, a magnificent edition of the collected works of Friedrich Nietzsche, is widely commented upon. The possibility of a separate Italian peace is mentioned for the first time—in the form of a denial. Churchill, Roosevelt, and Eisenhower have made a separate peace utterly impossible. As Dr. Kriegk explains:

> Italy realizes now that no confidence can be placed in Britain's or America's word, and the British will have to learn that the Italians can fight if anyone tries to destroy them.

Friday, July 30: Still nothing on the dissolution of the Fascist Party, etc. But Friday is the day Dr. Goebbels's weekly article appears in his magazine, Das Reich. There is intense curiosity as to what he will say about Italy. At midday DNB sends out its usual summary of the article —and Italy is not once mentioned. Five hours later the DNB editors receive a notice: they were mistaken in assuming that the article was by Goebbels; it was not by Goebbels. Das Reich appears on the newsstands, and for the first time in a year it has no article by Goebbels! The press and the radio suddenly resume the line of three days ago: nothing has changed Italy's international position or its alliance with Germany. Nothing has happened but a change of regime "appropriate to Italian conditions." The Italian people in an hour of danger have "rallied around their King."

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Soldier Walks Under the Trees of the University

The walls have been shaded for so many years
By the green magnificence of these great lives
Their bricks are darkened till the end of time.
(Small touching whites in the perpetual
Darkness that saturates the unwalled world;
Saved from the sky by leaves, and from the earth by stone.)
The pupils trust like flowers to the shades
And interminable twilight of these latitudes.

In our zone innocence is born in banks
And cultured in colonies the rich have sown:
The one is spared here what the many share
To write the histories that others are.
The oak escapes the storm that broke the reeds,
They read here; they read, too, of reeds,
Of storms; and are, almost, sublime
In their read ignorance of everything.

The poor are always—somewhere, but not here;
We read of them where they and Guilt subsist
With Death and Evil: in books, in books, in books.
Ah, sweet to contemplate the causes, not the things!
The soul learns fortitude in libraries,
Enduring patience in another's pain,
And pity for the lives we do not change:
All that the world would be, if it were real.

When will the boughs break blazing from these trees,
The darkened walls float heavenward like soot?
The days when men say: "Where we look is fire—
The iron branches flower in my veins"?
In that night even to be rich is difficult,
The world is something even books believe,
The bombs fall all year long among the states,
And the blood is black upon the unturned leaves.

RANDALL JARRELL

Ourself When Young

GENESIS. By Delmore Schwartz. New Directions. $3.

THIS poem may well be characterized in Eliot's words for Pound's "Hugh Selwyn Mauberley": "a positive document of sensibility." It is one of the few such documents recently produced in America. As the war's inattention to culture continues to undermine whatever aesthetic "standards" were professed before it, one is especially pleased by the fact that a young poet has kept his head and his craft well enough to illumine an experience not merely personal but to some extent true of all his perceptive contemporaries.

The time is this century, the place New York, the agonist a third-generation American of Russian-Jewish "extraction" —exquisite official word. We are introduced to him some time after he has fought his way through a New York childhood, memories of which are keeping him from sleep. Ancestral memories, too, going back to the generation which left Russia in dislike of military conscription. This assertion of individuality, generalized, becomes one of the main themes of the poem: the individual attempting to act with free choice in relation to, or at least to become aware of, the "deities"—for example, war, capitalism, sex—which affect him. As the youth recalls episode after episode in his and his parents' lives, they are interpreted both by his own growing intelligence and by a chorus of listening and commenting "ghosts." These symbolize attitudes of living men—cynical, ironic, idealistic—which the vast leisure of death has intensified rather than transformed: the poet is thus enabled to exercise a double irony, confronting the confused haplessness of life with the fully intelligent haplessness of death. The ghosts' dialogues with the hero, in blank verse, alternate with the episodes of family life, narrated in prose. "Genesis," the first book of a longer work, ends, in about the hero's seventh year, as his parents' long-growing estrangement explodes in a highly dramatic scene: his mother, driving by a roadhouse, sees his father dining with a mistress and rushes in, dragging the boy with her, to let loose a flood of hysterical denunciation. This is the catastrophe of the first stage of his pilgrimage: he enters a new phase of realized identity, both as victim and as potential agent. As he meditates on these events he still believes in his mortal capabilities: "The bed, the darkness, and my dear dark body/Are with me, certain—God is a dream!" In answer to which one of the ghosts has the last word: "Poor New York boy, with what finality/You will in time say—and triumphantly!/O what a metaphysical victory/ The first morning and night of death must be!"

It will be seen that, in narrative outline at least, the poem belongs to the genus Bildungsroman, species "Growing Up in America." What distinguishes it from other American stories treating this theme—I know of no other long poem in the species, barring "Hiawatha"—is that, for all the rigorous realism of its prose sequences, it is not bound by realist conventions. In American writing these conventions—even when there is an attempt to break loose from them, as in Dos Passos's interjections—usually make the hero a mere bundle of emotions, more easily conceived as reacting to than acting on the environment to which the writer devotes most of his descriptive skill. This vice of the fluid or interchangeable protagonist (exercise: distinguish Eugene Gant from Robert Jordan, in six easy lessons) Schwartz has easily surmounted, knowing—to paraphrase Aristotle—that poetry is more philosophic than fiction. His characters are not types so much as symbols, and symbols of human impulses that are clarified, not diluted, by his presentation of their spatia and temporal conditions. This gives them a certain mythica stature, which Schwartz, as his purpose varies, may leave implicit—as in the escaping grandfather's Ulyssean character and adventures; or point up—the final phrase in the narrative of the catastrophe is, "After Medea cried aloud and lytemnestra struck." Thus in his hands the myth element oins the chorus as another double weapon, deftly used both or tragic and ironic connotation; it does not, as with many ecent converts to the Myth, become a bludgeon.

The focus, then, of this comedy—in the Dantean sense—f good and evil is not society, or heroism, or adolescence in ur time, as with most Bildungsromane—an exception being The Magic Mountain," to which Schwartz's poem is in any ways spiritually akin—but one human individual, presented and considered in all the categories of relation: to is family, the family; to some boys, some girls, childhood; o the sidewalks of New York, the quick and the dead. chwartz adumbrates a theme of the first importance and alue: the infinite possibilities, logically and ethically udied, of human individuality. This and its uncompromisng technical skill are what make the poem not only a docuent but positive. "You lie in the coffin of your character," ne of the ghosts says to the boy; but another asks, "Who an recover actuality? And who can win his way to critiism?" If "Genesis" is a statement of this question, it creates onfidence that the answer too will be aesthetically valid. espite occasional garrulous aridity, it suggests as a whole a enuinely tragic view of life, which needs stating more than ver against the prevalent falsettos uttering or claiming to ispel premature indifference and despair.

dventure in the Sky

OD IS MY CO-PILOT. By Colonel Robert L. Scott, Jr. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

ALTA STORY. By W. L. River. Based on the diary and experiences of Flying Officer Howard M. Coffin, R. A. F. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

ORPEDO 8: THE STORY OF SWEDE LARSON'S BOMBER SQUADRON. By Ira Wolfert. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THE young men who are fighting this war in the sky were fascinated, as boys, by the mechanical contraption hat enabled men to speed through the air. They simply had o fly. "You are up there pitying all earth-bound creatures," ays Robert Scott. They realize, of course, that a staggering ercentage of their number die; but each man thinks death ay come to someone else, not to him. "Fighter pilots," olonel Scott explains, "don't think of not coming back."

Scott's first flight, at the age of twelve, was in a glider e built; he took off from the roof of a house and crashed ixty-seven feet to the ground. The next year he bought an ncient plane at an auction and managed to make it go. For he sake of more flying he joined the army and battered his ay into West Point. When the army flew the air mail in 934, Scott was one of the pilots.

He had great difficulty getting into war flying because of is advanced age, thirty-four; but finally he was assigned to four-motored bomber and set off across the Atlantic and frica for the Far East in the hope of bombing Tokyo. This idn't work out, and he found himself flying a transport lane over the mountains of Burma and China. He dropped thousands of pounds of rice to starving Chinese soldiers, ferried hundreds of refugees out of Burma (but not General Stilwell, who preferred to walk), and once got lost over Assam bringing three tons of tin out from China to India.

Still Scott's appetite for adventure was unsatisfied, so he talked General Chennault into lending him a P-40 fighter, and conducted a one-man, free-lance war against the Japanese in Burma. He took a morning off one day, just for the fun of it, and flew 29,000 feet to the top of Mt. Everest and on up two miles above it. Then at long last he got what he really wanted—a chance to shoot down Japanese aviators in team warfare. He became commanding officer of the Army Fighter Group in China, which was the successor of the disbanded American Volunteer Group under General Chennault. He and his fellow-flyers were so active that the Tokyo radio belabored and belittled them. "We don't think the American fighter force in China is more than 300 ships," said Tokyo. Actually, the number was thirty-two.

Colonel Scott pecked out his 277-page book with two fingers on a portable typewriter when he returned to the United States, and he did an excellent job of it. The reader gets all the thrills of flying and fighting, with none of the hazards. Why Scott chose the title, "God Is My Co-Pilot," is a mystery known only to him, but it shouldn't put anyone off from reading his exciting tale.

Howard Coffin was air-crazy, too. He joined the R. A. F. and was sent out from England in the summer of 1941, headed for Cairo he hoped. He landed at Malta in a group of 200 fighter pilots, thinking it was only a stop on the way. Then the news was broken to the flyers that they were assigned to Malta for the duration, meaning the duration of their lives. Coffin, however, survived; he was one of the six out of the original 200 who did.

"Malta Story" is a novel, written by W. L. River, about Coffin's year on the most bombed bit of land in the world. There is something of a plot, complete with a love story; this can be skimmed through rapidly. The merit of the book lies in its truly fine picture of the island's struggle for survival under an almost unceasing rain of German and Italian bombs. The picture is well-rounded. One gets the feel of the place, even the smell of it. One gets to know the remarkable Englishman who commanded the flyers and fought with them; the Italian priest who left a safe church in Italy to be with the Maltese for the duration—until he was buried in the wreckage of his cathedral on Easter morning; and the young girl named Lina who steered a fishing boat up to a German flyer in the water, supposedly to rescue him—and killed him with a boat hook.

In "Torpedo 8" Ira Wolfert writes the chronicle of a bomber squadron, starting in Virginia and following the flyers to Hawaii, Midway, and Guadalcanal. In Hawaii they got word that the Japanese were descending on Midway; eighteen men of the squadron were ordered out in six planes to attack the oncoming enemy. "Everybody was down to see them off. It was like a college football team going off to the big game." Of the six planes, one returned, and one of its crew of three was dead.

The men picked for replacements were not happy about coming into Torpedo 8, but Swede Larson, the commanding officer, gave them a talk. "Torpedo 8 still exists," said Swede, "and the way I feel, it exists to get vengeance." It did so. The squadron fought in all the air-sea battles of last fall when the Japanese were trying desperately to regain Guadalcanal. It fought until all its planes were smashed. But most of its men were alive on Guadalcanal, so Swede Larson distributed tommy-guns, rifles, and hand grenades and told the men to fight on the ground. It was better for morale than not fighting at all. Torpedo 8 came down to earth, dug foxholes in it, and went on with the war.

These three books—"God Is My Co-Pilot," "Malta Story," and "Torpedo 8"—are primarily adventure stories in that modern locale of adventure, the sky, which still seems an incredible realm to those of us who are earth-bound. They are good books. Sometime, I hope, an even better book will be written about aerial warfare; it will record the changing thoughts of a human being as he progresses from the stage of a boy fascinated by a flying gadget into the premature maturity of a killer.

"The English"

BRITAIN AND THE BRITISH PEOPLE. By Ernest Barker. Oxford University Press. $1.25.

THE ENGLISH PEOPLE: IMPRESSIONS AND OBSERVATIONS. By D. W. Brogan. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

OF ALL the books that no one can write, those about nations and national character are the most impossible. Perhaps Edmund Burke, who long ago said he did not know the way to indict a whole people, might have been willing to change his meaning slightly, and likewise his spelling, so as to read, "indite"; for the reason which moved him to make the one statement would apply to the other: a people is too numerous, too various, too much an epitome of mankind, to be cited for judgment in a formula, or even in a string of formulas modifying and annulling one another.

Yet this truth goes visibly against the common grain. Everyone longs to put into a nutshell his synthetic impression of his own or another people. Stranger still, nearly everyone likes to read the impressions of others on "the Frenchman," "the Englishman," "the American," in order to argue, accept, and reject definitions—dancing a sort of gavotte upon a quicksand. This taste and tendency are always at their height in war time, when the urge to collective curiosity, friendship, and hate is kindled by political necessities. Hence the timeliness of the publication by the Oxford Press of a series of small volumes—including the present one on Britain—under the general title of "The World Today"; and of Mrs. Alfred Knopf's invitation to Professor Brogan to set down his "Impressions and Observations" on the English people.

Though the two works before us were also both written by professors of history, they ought not to be compared. Whereas Ernest Barker's covers in slightly more than 125 pages the standard topics of social and political description, Mr. Brogan's ranges discursively over all imaginable subjects, from Tom Brown's school days to strip-tease vaudeville, in 300 packed pages. It is notable, however, that both writers have been forced by their aim to assert that "the English" are very much a group apart, of whom certain things can be predicated with assurance. Mr. Barker, who once wrote an admirable critique of nationalism, now sets forth a good dea of dubious fact about the presence of certain physical stocks and mental characteristics in the English "mixture," qualifying his belief, in one instance, as "a permissible guess and a pardonable faith." Early in his book Mr. Brogan also plumps for the fact that "the Englishman's Englishness is ineradicable. History, climate, general good luck . . . have given him institutions, habits of life, a world view that can only be explained in English terms. . . . [To the Englishman] a world without England would have no adequate standards of rightness. . . . So it has been ever since 'Britain first a heaven's command arose from out the azure main.'"

After taking in these two opinions, whether shared o merely reported by their authors, it is clear that being the chosen nation, and finding material reasons for it, is not a pretense and practice confined to the enemy. I agree with Professor Brogan that this belief in English rightness probably exists in many Englishmen, but I agree even more with his later statement: "At moments, their sole apparent bond of union appears to be the fact that they are 'English,' and being English seems to have hardly any definable content a all." In other words, it is only when one has to talk abou "the English" in the lump, or when one follows the will-o' the-wisp of the typical, the average, the majority, that one succumbs to the nationalist's "permissible guess and pardonable faith."

Yet see where it lands you. In order to speak truthfully o many generations of men living under different condition Mr. Barker has to conclude that "the British people has no been untouched by poetry, or by the spirit of scientific inquiry and scientific invention, but it may be confessed that i the estimation of the world, if not in its own aspiration, i has largely turned to the practical arts of economics an politics." The whole fallacy lies here: "in its own aspiration" whose? Chaucer's? Shelley's? Rupert Brooke's? Tell us, i you wish, that like every large mass of people the Englis care little for poetry and not at all for living poets, but d not perform a subtraction by which English literature is mere "touch" deductible from Blackstone's "Commentaries and the (non-poetic) quotations of Lombard Street.

In these matters Professor Brogan does hardly better. He assigns the English one art, literature, apparently thinking tha the world's ignorance of the great English musical traditio —fully comparable to the German—and of English paintin —fully comparable to the French—is a measure of the fact But he recoups the loss by crediting England especially wit the invention of machines and the spread of Darwinism, i manifest injustice to the facts of technological and biologic history. The truth is that no discussion of any Western cu tural products which is not European in scope and outloo is worth the shelf room it occupies. Partial accounts on harden parochial prejudice, both the overweening and th ignorantly modest.

There remain politics and social life. Mr. Barker's accou of these is largely conventional and academic. Little or noth ing is said of the way England earns its living. There a chapters on Government, Law, Church, and Social Servic but none on trade unionism and few indications of the actu as against the theoretical working of institutions.

In contrast, Professor Brogan's avalanche of concrete ar verse facts is excessive and unmanageable. For a reason that cannot guess, Professor Brogan seems throughout to be oking over his shoulder at his English audience. He told earlier that England is explicable only in English terms, hich I find a paradoxical type of explanation. At any rate, ough he has lived for long periods in this country and ows much about it, he has hardly taken pains to make his en subtle views clear to Americans. His chapters are ill- ganized, full of distracting comparisons, and choked with pporting proofs in the form of frequent half-page foot- tes. Above all, he is smartly allusive à la Guedálla. How any of his American readers will understand even so simple sentence as "We have moved a long way from Tract XC"? should like a Gallup poll on the subject. And again, who tside a university will understand Carthusians to be pupils , Charterhouse School or will grasp the sense of comparing e Monmouth rebellion with la Vendée? There is not a page thout a puzzle. It is really a pity that a writer so full of owledge, wisdom, and fine wit should have missed the pportunity of being at once informative and enlightened, of ting as a real translator of meanings between the two coun- es he knows so well.

For in the hands of a somewhat studious reader Mr. ogan's book is useful, entertaining, rich in new material d solid thinking. His opening sermon on political morality refreshing; his fairness and historical sense in dealing with ermany are very creditable, and his willingness to pitch into merican errors of judgment shows courage. But the form d the criteria of selection are wanting. I am convinced by th these volumes on England that except for works of nius like Bagehot's "English Constitution," the form quisite to convey an explanation of a people is the historical. on't describe! Tell us what happened, who was there, and said what. Then we may get something nearer the ngled reality of national traditions and national divisions. e hear about minority views as well as prevailing ones, e see genius as well as crime, without being compelled to rike an average; we see the assets pell-mell with the liabili- es; we see human history, in short, instead of a balance eet for the past drawn up by a necessarily uncertified private countant.

JACQUES BARZUN

The Island of Chile

CHILE: A GEOGRAPHIC EXTRAVAGANZA. By Benjamín Subercaseaux. Translated by Angel Flores. The Macmillan Company. $3.

IN THIS "crazy geography," as a literal translation of the original Spanish title of this book would have it, one of e best known of Chile's young writers gives us a penetrat- g description of his country and his countrymen.

The geography of Chile is unique. Its central section has climate as Mediterranean as Italy, in the south it is a replica f Norway, and the person most likely to be at home in its orthern desert would probably be an Arab from Libya. hese things are well known to all, but it has taken a writer ho is not a professional geographer to point out a large umber of interesting consequences. Chile is separated from e world by a desert in the north, it faces polar ice in the south and the Andes on the east, while in the west it confronts the limitless expanse of the Pacific. Until the coming of the plane, in fact, it was one of the most isolated countries in the world and, indeed, "should be called an island even though this does not fit in with the geographical definition of an island." When one realizes these facts it is not so surprising that Chileans have lived "immersed in isolation," and that it took them longer than most South Americans to awaken to the menace of the Axis.

The title of "crazy geography" which Mr. Subercaseaux gave to his book does not refer, however, to the configuration of Chile, but to the unorthodox way in which he has tackled his subject. "What we are seeking here," he says, "is to get the feeling of Chile," and he begins forthwith to describe it in a manner as refreshingly original in style as it is unusual in content. He springs a surprise on the reader from the very first page, for he sets out to praise the Portuguese discoverers at the expense of the Spanish captains, most unusual for anyone from a Spanish-speaking country. That this is no momentary aberration is proved by a reference later on in the book to the conquistadors, who have in recent times been the recipients of the most fulsome praise, and whom he calls "dull." Mr. Subercaseaux has strong individual views.

Slicing his country up into neat and picturesquely labeled sections—the nitrate region, for example, he calls the "Land of Tranquil Mornings," and the lake district the "Land of the Blue Mirrors"—he takes the reader down the entire 2,600,-mile length of Chile from Arica to the fastnesses of Tierra del Fuego. His main concern is the appearance, location, and above all the spirit of its mountains, cities, and people. He is openly scornful of current geographies which "are economic, as if written for merchants," and he brings his own discussions of these matters to life by dealing extensively with the people who live in the many climates of Chile, how they earn their bread, and how they think.

Mr. Subercaseaux is critical of much that he sees in his country, and it would appear that large numbers of his countrymen are too, for this book was a best-seller in Chile. Although he is a member of one of the first families in the country, he openly voices his disapproval of the great landowners: "Each hacendado has a tone, a family virtue, and a self-assurance which makes association with him painful to me." He has a fellow-feeling for the depressed and the poverty-stricken, the Indians, the coal miners of Lota, who live in "an accumulation of poor narrow streets filled with gloomy shacks."

This "crazy geography" may not be the work of a trained geographer, but it is certainly that of a man who knows every inch of Chile and is remarkably observant. It has plenty of spice in it, and the meat to go with it.

The translation is ably done, although it might perhaps be mentioned that kilometers do not make so much sense to a northern eye as miles. It is a pity that somebody did not take a hint from the title of one of the chapters, Wherein a Good Map Is Needed to Find Out Where You Are, for after going through a maze of names of places not mentioned on the highly decorative but quite inadequate map on the first end paper, or indeed in most atlases, the reader is liable to find himself in doubt as to his whereabouts.

Mitchell's Wonderful McSorley

McSORLEY'S WONDERFUL SALOON. By Joseph Mitchell. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

GENRE paintings resemble feature stories. They take a mellow, or raffish, or appetizing area of life and memorialize it by the affection they have for their subject. Too often, unfortunately, they remain ephemeral, registering but a moment of warmth. But John Sloan's painting of McSorley's, an old bar on East Seventh Street, in New York, is still remembered. And other painters, though somewhat less impressively, have also inscribed their affection for the place Now Joseph Mitchell, ex-newspaperman who contributes special features to the New Yorker, has assembled twenty of these pieces and put them in a book with the title of "McSorley's Wonderful Saloon."

He begins with McSorley's, recounting its sawdust career under four changes of management in the last eighty-nine years. Then he ambles over to the Bowery, where he describe Mazie, the brassy blonde who presides at the ticket window of the "bums'" favorite movie palace. He inspects gypsie and museum-keepers; glorifies Joe Gould, the Greenwich Village eccentric who has translated several of Longfellow's poems into Seagull; chats with Madame Olga, the Bearded Lady, and laments the lapse into respectability of a once boisterous gin mill. He sympathizes with old scrubbers fron the skyscrapers and with cave-dwellers from Central Park He finds a drinking reformer and a Times Square "sport" who arranges a yearly benefit ball for himself.

In the second section of his book, Mr. Mitchell celebrate beefsteak fests, clam-diggers, and terrapin-raisers; in a thir he suggests potentialities as a short-story writer (in Goodbye Shirley Temple and in On the Wagon), while in the last h delineates both joys and depredations in his home communit near the Little Pee Dee River, in North Carolina. For th most part he remains objective, assembling facts, measuring limiting himself to exact data. This gives one the sense o an honest camera shot, deliberate but unmoving. Sometime he chides city inhabitants for their lack of gumption, an then he seems to editorialize. At best, he touches some subterranean chord which puts us en rapport with the metropolitan community. Old McSorley—father and then son— draws the taps and eyes the aging men who harbor in th creaking chairs. Mazie, locking her wicket, paces the darke reaches of the Bowery, seeking the wastrels who might otherwise perish in the night. These moments are cherishable, an they give us something that O'Henry, in many ways th predecessor of Mitchell, could not convey.

This is the sympathetic penetration of life. Sloan had in "McSorley's," and certainly in his early etchings. The mo smoldering George Luks—surely an American genre painte if there ever was one—all but entered the very marrow of h subjects. True, the density and the richness are not attaine to the same degree as in the Dutch, such as Van Ostade, c the demoniac Jan Steen. But new affiliations have been mad between man and his fellows. And in this sense, Josep Mitchell, who is at all times a scrupulous and attentive write has contributed something comparable to the best of ou twentieth-century genre painters. JEROME MELLQUIST

HE FIGHTING SOUTH. By John Temple Graves. G. P. Putnam's Sons.
$2.75.

his seems the most genuinely reveal-g of the several books of the past few ars by Southern liberals about the outh. It describes rather than theorizes, d is particular rather than general.
/hen explanations and theories are lled for, Mr. Graves marshals views every sort by direct quotation, and aves the reader to draw conclusions.
he author's own views are urbanely aborated, with a mixture of personal etail charmingly interwoven. He lays re the shortcomings of the South hile preserving a warm natural belief, rdly requiring explicit statement, in hat every Southerner regards as the ualities of the South. It is equally clear at his love of the South is part of his ve of America, as his love of America part of his love of humanity. In short, is a natural, not theoretical, liberal,
emocrat, and patriot.

HE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEE-THOVEN. By John N. Burk. Random House. $2.75.

n this substantial volume a separate alf is given to the works of Beethoven, hich are listed and analyzed with the onciseness, learning, and taste which ose who are familiar with Mr. Burk's usical criticism would expect. There e also a valuable list of phonograph cords and a useful index; but, curi-usly enough, no bibliography is proded for the serious reader whom this olume will attract. The accompanying fe is, however, based on the best pub-shed sources. Although it does not prend to the same general appeal as Mr. urk's beautiful "Clara Schumann: A omantic Biography," it is written with e same simplicity and escapes both the ntimental and clinical interpretations achieve a plain realism rare in lives the musical Titan.

IGHTING UP LIBERIA. By Arthur
I. Hayman and Harold Preece. Creative Age Press. $2.50.

Ir. Hayman spent many years—though e is still a young man—as a company lministrator in Liberia. With the col-boration of Harold Preece he has comressed into one short and absorbing ook, made up of history, sociology, itobiography, politics, and anthropol-gy, enough to leave the name of Liberia ermanently etched on any liberal American's consciousness and conscience. If the historical portions are slightly too fictionalized, there is nothing fictional about the passionate exposé of social and political conditions maintained with our connivance—conditions on which Mr. Hayman is careful to quote verbatim the reports of the League Commission.

WILLIAM PRESTON JOHNSTON. A Transitional Figure of the Confederacy. By Arthur Marvin Shaw. Louisiana State University Press. $3.

The subject of this biography is the eldest son of the Confederate general Albert Sidney Johnston and the biographer of his father. He fought in the Confederate army and after the war was professor under Lee at Lexington, Virginia, president of Louisiana State University, and first president of Tulane University. Mr. Shaw's book is written in a scholarly manner and fully documented from published and unpublished sources.

DRAMA

THE amateur spirit, when it is supported by just enough professional skill to keep it off the ground, is a bewitching sprite; and the amateur spirit animates the cast and disarms, and charms, the audience at "The Army Play by Play" (Martin Beck Theater). It is practically embodied in Pfc Keith Davis, who starts off the performance by singing "Wartime Lullaby." The song, written by Mrs. General Drum, is terrible, but Private Davis, with his sparkling blue eyes, his happy smile, his "nice singing voice," and his desire to please is quite irresistible. (In all fairness I should say that Mrs. Drum's unrelieved imitation of the worst song of World War I, "Just a Baby's Prayer, etc.," is not a whit worse than the other song Mr. Davis sings, which is, if I heard aright, one of the lesser works of Woodrow Wilson.)

Fortunately the five plays are, with one exception, far better than the lyrics of Drum and Wilson. These plays are the prize winners among 115 submitted from United States Army posts throughout the world in a contest sponsored by John Golden in association with the Army Second Service Command. Two of them were written by former actors, one by a radio serial writer, one by a Yale School of Drama man who had done a good deal of minor directing here and there, and one by a Viennese, now a corporal in the American army, who studied with Max Reinhardt. (Meaning no offense, is there any theatrically literate refugee who hasn't worked or studied with Reinhardt?)

The best of the plays is Corporal Irving Gaynor Nieman's "Button Your Lip," in which the most sensational rumors-about-camp settle on a rookie. He is suspected (1) of being a saboteur and (2) of being the boy friend of the visiting film star. It's an amusing situation and it is nicely tossed about. Needless to say, there is a happy-as-usual ending in which a lieutenant is made to look silly and the film star embraces the rookie. The next best is "Pack Up Your Troubles" by Pfc Alfred D. Geto, in which two Nazi spies get hopelessly entangled with a private who is trying against all the odds and regulations to make a telephone call to a Long Island hospital where his wife is having a baby. "Where'er We Go" by Pfc John B. O'Dea pretends to be no more than a slice of life—cut very thin—in almost any barracks, and it does very well as that.

"Mail Call" by Air Cadet, now Lieutenant, Ralph Nelson is the only one of the plays that can be called serious—the buddies of a soldier who has been shot for running away in battle write a letter to his family, certifying his bravery—but the script is not equal to the theme. As for "First Cousins," a melodrama by Corporal Kurt S. Kasznar, I regret to say it is quite bad, Reinhardt or no Reinhardt.

The sketches by American soldiers play only over the surface of army life, which, as it appears here, is something of a cross between urban collegiate and juke-box. The dialogue is facile and fairly fast, and a good deal of it sounds as if it might have been dipped out of that endless flood of patter which pours out of Hollywood and the radio. It is entertaining while it lasts—and "The Army Play by Play" provides a pleasant evening—but it offers no food for second thought. I was going to say that I would have expected something better among those 115 plays, but experience distills slowly and it is not likely that we shall get the real story of army life in World War II for some time to come. This version is definitely slanted to the lighter, noisier aspects. At one or two points there is the sound of whistling in the dark, but it would be foolish to assume that any great proportion of men in the army know it's dark—if only because the general run of Americans of which they are a part is scarcely aware of it either.

The five plays are interspersed with specialties which deserve mention. Private Jules Munshin's caricatures are extremely clever, and you have no idea how funny a couple of acrobats can look—in this case the Brothers Arnaut—when they go on playing their violins, in unison, no matter what outlandish positions they get into.

"The Two Mrs. Carrolls" with Elisabeth Bergner (Booth Theater) brings up several rather old and tiresome questions: (1) How could an agent, a producer, or a director, let alone all three, read this play by Martin Vale and not know at the end of the first act that it was hopelessly bad from every point of view—dramatic, literary, commercial? (2) Assuming it got to the point of rehearsal, how could these same people see it through more than once and still not recognize that simple, overpowering fact? (3) Why does an actress with the reputation of Elisabeth Bergner consent to appear in such a play? And (4) having committed herself to it why does she play the part of a murderee in a cheap melodrama as if it were a totally different part in a totally different kind of play?

MARGARET MARSHALL

RECORDS

FOR years now one has been able to observe Stokowski's tendency in the direction of tonal elephantiasis by comparing his new recorded performance of a work with his early one. Thus, his performance of the E flat minor Prelude from Book 1 of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier with the Philadelphia Orchestra many years ago—which was lurid enough, God knows—took one side of a Victor record; but now two sides in Columbia's latest Bach-Stokowski set (541, $3.50) are needed for all the expanding and contracting of string tone that is his performance of the piece with the All-American Orchestra. The volume also includes two pieces which Stokowski has, I believe, newly transcribed for his purpose: one is the Andante movement from the A minor Sonata for unaccompanied violin, which he calls Andante Sostenuto to correspond with its transformation from a piece intended to be taken at a "walking" pace to a dirge that permits all the phony-eloquent orchestral goings-on which he waves his hands over. And the slow movement of the F minor Clavier Concerto gets the same treatment.

I dare say the expanding and contracting sound was exciting to listen to in the living performance; but from these records it comes out of a wide-range reproducing set-up—a Scott 23 with a Brush pickup—muddy, gritty, distorted, and mixed with the noises of bad surfaces. Nor is it much better when the range is reduced by switching to an Astatic Trutan pickup; only when the range is further reduced by use of the treble-control does one get a sound that is wholly lacking in brightness and brilliance, but agreeable to the ear and unmixed with noises. In addition, sides 1 and 6 of my review copy waver badly in pitch. But the set is worth its price for the cover design, which in pictorial terms achieves one of the most perceptive critical evaluations of Stokowski that I have encountered.

Columbia also has issued Brahms's Sonata Opus 120 No. 1 for piano and viola (Set 487, $3.50), in which one may observe Brahms in the process of grinding it out, using all his skill in manipulating sounds to produce an external shell of a sonata structure—the themes, the transitions, the hushed suspense here, the imposing climax there—which is hollow and empty inside. The performance by Egon Petri and Samuel Lifschey is excellent; its recorded sound is fairly good—with the piano clear and true but dull, and the viola on the other hand a little shrill. The surfaces are bad; and the fifth side of my review copy wavers a little in pitch.

A year or so ago Victor issued a set in which three of Wagner's five songs to Mathilde Wesendonck—"Träume," "Im Treibhaus," and "Schmerzen"—were sung by Traubel with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski. Now Columbia has issued "Träume" and "Im Treibhaus" sung by Lotte Lehmann with piano accompaniments by Paul Ulanowsky (71469-D, $1). I continue to find "Träume" only slightly interesting; but "Im Treibhaus," I now realize, is one of Wagner's most extraordinary compositions: it uses the thematic material of his wonderful orchestral Prelude to the third act of "Tristan und Isolde" in a piece of declamation which astoundingly anticipates the harmonic disintegration and the declamatory vocal line that we have heard in our own century. As for the merits of the Traubel and Lehmann versions, Traubel's voice was afflicted by strong tremolo in "Träume," but was steady, powerful, and opulent in "Im Treibhaus"; at its best, however, her singing lacked the emotional warmth and subtle inflection that make Lehmann's performances so deeply affecting. The orchestral coloring also is important in these songs; but on the Victor records the orchestra was blanketed by the voice much of the time, whereas the piano is heard clearly on the Columbia record. Then the introduction which Wagner thought it necessary to write for "Träume" must be considered important; and the Columbia record includes it, whereas the Victor omitted it. Voice and piano are well reproduced on the Columbia record; surfaces are poor.

The older set which Columbia features as its record classic for August is the one of Beecham's performance of Act 4 of Puccini's "La Bohême" with the London Philharmonic, Lisa Perli, Stella Andreva, Heddle Nash, John Brownlee, and others (Set 274, $4.50). Puccini was my first love in opera—and it was the music, not only Farrar's looks, that held me enthralled; but today I find its pallid sentimentalities and archnesses and the style of their execution unendurable. I must therefore regret Columbia's choice of the music; but it is right about the performance and recording, which are very fine. And the surfaces are quiet—which is something I have noticed about other such recent Columbia pressings of older recordings that were made in England. It would seem to indicate that the processing of the recording itself has something to do with the amount of noise from surfaces.

. and Pro

ar Sirs: As a fellow-sufferer from rious and lengthy investigations, I fully corroborate the statements ade by the writer of Washington Ges-o in your issue of July 17. I too have en questioned concerning my past, my ture, about the company I keep and company I have kept. Of course my alifications were of the highest and ile my record would not fill a half-ge of "Who's Who," it has been no-ed by some.

To keep the record straight, I too have en interviewed concerning the "char-er" of prospective employees or em-oyees of various branches of the gov-ment service, both civilian and mili-
y. The questions enumerated by your iter sounded very familiar, and with nor variations due to the individual itiative of the particular investigator about the same as I was asked. One vestigator went so far as to ask ether employee Z had displayed any eference in the recent discussions be-een Poland and Russia. Another nted to know about employee Y's at-ude toward the Rapp-Coudert inves-gation. A third wanted to know ether Z had shown sympathy for the Loyalists during the Spanish Civil War.

Were it not for the fact that we are a nation engaged in a life-and-death struggle for survival as a democracy, the above might be glossed over as trivial and amusing incidents involving minor government officials. As it is, however, the character of these investigations reflects the ugly picture of biased officials sniping at loyal Americans on the home front, sapping their morale and interfering with essential and even vital activities here at home. Some of these investigators should be investigated. Or are they simply carrying out instructions? A Nation READER

What Makes Republicans That Way

Dear Sirs: For twenty years I have lived in a Connecticut community, a beautiful town infested with Republicans. The figures are, I believe, about 90 per cent. Someone asked me why I lived in an environment which was so unsympathetic. I replied, "I am not very bright and I know it. Hence I have an inferiority complex. However, all things are relative, and to live among these economic illiterates builds me up. Furthermore, as William Blake wrote, 'Love relaxes—damn braces.'" So, living here, I am always braced.

What particularly irritates these people is that I bear all the labels the snobs revere: Brookline, the Back Bay, the Harvard Club of New York. My "shibboleth" is as authentic as theirs. Even worse, my wife is a member of the Junior League. That makes me "a traitor to my class."

To study such people in their habitat is an educational if not elevating experience. I am now ready to report upon what makes reactionaries tick, or even whirr and explode.

First: they are, literally, economically illiterate. Study the libraries in their beautiful homes and you will find not one volume dealing with economics. They are completely without the information necessary to an intelligent verdict upon a political question. I am willing to grant that certain minds which are truly informed might honestly arrive at a reactionary conclusion, a conclusion which I would reject. These are natural Tories and not all of them are uninformed or unintelligent. Their limitation is one of heart rather than of head. They are ungenerous and lack a social conscience. They need more of the milk of human kindness. Also, usually, they are unimaginative.

These neighbors of mine, however, are not educated relative to today's problems. This does not explain their psychopathic hatred of President Roosevelt. My clinical analysis is as follows: Within almost everyone is what old-fashioned people called a conscience. It is the force which is insistently challenging us to grow larger, to "build more stately mansions." What an irritating factor! A foe to complacency; a spur to progress. Who wants to be spurred? Doesn't a horse hate a spur? These rabid Republicans hate Roosevelt because he is a challenge; he makes them uncomfortable. Their consciences know that he is superior in largeness, in charity, in breadth of sympathy, and in intelligence. What an annoyance! Damn the man! Instead of facing themselves honestly and seeking to emulate him it is much easier to damn him. Thus they achieve a temporary surcease from their discomfort. By gathering together for the purpose of assuring one another of the worthlessness of "that man in the White House" they get the same result yielded by aspirin in the case of pain. No such bitterness was displayed against Wilson because he did not deal with social-economic problems. He did not make people uncomfortable. Prior to the Civil War, Southern slaveholders hated the Abolitionists with venomous ferocity because the latter attacked them upon a point regarding which many of them already felt uncomfortable. Toward the North as a whole they felt no such hostility. "It's the truth that cuts." Thus President Roosevelt, with his obvious sympathy for the under dog ("the only true democrat is the aristocrat"); his instinctive sense of justice; his mildness, like that of a noble Newfoundland; his patent superiority to his detractors, even in facial expression and personal appearance, is a living indictment of their pettiness, their ungenerous natures.

As an American, one feels ashamed of these expressions of everything contrary to the ideals of Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln. One wonders why a nation which was given such an opportunity to create "a brave new world" on an unspoiled continent should have bred such types. Then one realizes that probably they are merely at a lower point of spiritual progress, that we who flatter ourselves upon our superiority to them are far from perfect; and we possess our souls in patience. In Whitman's words, "perhaps we passed that way huge times ago." Doubtless all Roosevelt-baiters die and go to Hell for a period, but as Emerson said, "although Hell exists it is disciplinary, not punitive, in its significance." Thus:

> So long as the Light holds out to burn
> The vilest Republican may return.

Not Lost

Dear Sirs: To my disadvantage a trial subscription to The Nation ends this month. First I would like to say that although the subscription is not to be renewed you will not be losing a reader—a very much enlightened and thankful reader—as I have already made arrangements with my book dealer to hold a copy for me each week. Paradoxical it may be, but while I can save fifteen cents a week by walking a fare limit, or smoking a little less, or spending a nickel or so less for a breakfast or lunch here and there, I can't raise $5 in a lump sum. I've tried it but every time I had two or three dollars put aside, away it would go for one of the books reviewed in The Nation. Reviewed in a way that only Nation reviewers can do it. Reviews that whet the appetite. Reviews that can be depended on, especially when a recommendation is made (maybe when the book is condemned too, but I've yet either to read or to buy a book that has been condemned by Nation reviewers).

Secondly: A few thank-you's. To I. F. Stone for his brave "inside" stories of doings in Washington. To Jack Barrett for his cross-word puzzles (although I've yet to solve completely one of the damned things). To Diana Trilling for tips on good fiction and for tips on "what-not-to-read" fiction. To the Editors for (1) In the Wind—even though it sometimes makes me wonder if all your good work isn't going for nought; (2) The Shape of Things—for which I wait each week so that I may have a true understanding of the news I've read during the week—the results are amusing and amazing; and (3) for a true, open, unbiased, and willing-to-see-both-sides attitude on the (a) Negro, (b) Jewish, (c) Catholic church, (d) post-war, and (e) labor questions and issues.

In general, do you, as editors and authors, fully realize the breadth and depth of (I) the white's dislike and distrust of the Negro, (II) the Catholic's and the Protestant's ditto of the Jew, (III) the Protestant's ditto of the Catholic, (IV) damned near everyone's ditto of any "decent" post-war world aid, and (V) the office worker's ditto of unions and labor questions in general? As I am an office worker, my vision may be limited, but the discussions I have with others (store owners and workers, neighborhood defense workers, soldier friends on leave, relatives of all religions and jobs, and transients in buses and restaurants) doesn't allow me to take a very optimistic attitude. The Daily News seems to have more influence, not only on its readers but on the general public, than do The Nation, the New Republic, PM, and any others you may care to have classified with you.

Would it be possible for you to print an article regarding the truth or falseness of the talk I've heard (by three participants in the last war and by three members of the present army, one officer and two non-coms) about how the veterans are going to take care of the Jews as soon as the boys come home from this war? It seems that they are either going to start a new party or get control of one of the present parties and then, once in control at Washington, clear out the Jews in responsible official positions and then work on the ones in business. It also seems that labor is to be put in its place too.

Conscientious Objectors

Dear Sirs: Although the system of dealing with conscientious objectors in World War II is a great improvement over that of World War I, its administration has resulted in imprisoning over twice as many men of genuine conscience as were imprisoned in that war. Over 1,100 objectors to military service on conscientious grounds are in prison today, and their number is being increased by 75 to 100 a month. The reasons for this extraordinary result of a more liberal system are:

1. A narrow interpretation of the requirement of "religious training and belief" as the basis of conscientious objection, commonly interpreted by the Selective Service System in terms of belief in deity and of connection with a church. Hundreds not so recognized refuse military service and are sent to prison.

2. Failure to provide any service of national importance other than Civilian Public Service camps on the CCC model, to which many men object as "boondoggling." Refusal to accept a CPS assignment results in a prison sentence.

3. The direction of Selective Service by military officers—contrary to the explicit provision of law—whose limited notions of conscience control all Presidential appeals and all paroles from prison.

4. The commitment to prison of over 500 Jehovah's Witnesses who have refused all service under conscription, demanding a ministerial status, but who could at least be given more useful work than prison occupations.

The undersigned members of the National Committee on Conscientious Objectors, organized by the American Civil Liberties Union, are endeavoring to help solve the problems presented not only by the imprisonment of over 1,100 men but also to provide other forms of national service not associated with Civilian Public Service camps so that all genuine conscientious objectors may be engaged in occupations of use to the country.

The vast majority of men are today segregated in prisons and camps while the manpower shortage calls for every available man in productive work. Conscientious objectors are willing and eager to engage in a host of occupations not related to the conduct of the war which contribute to the national welfare. Many of them have volunteered for dangerous experiments and services

Readers of The Nation can assist in this work by contributing to the expenses of maintaining representatives a Washington and of handling test case in the courts by sending funds to Dr Evan W. Thomas, treasurer, at 170 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Among those who sign this communication are members of the American Legion, who do not of course suppor the pacifist position and yet who hold that all genuine conscientious objector should be given every opportunity for useful public service.

THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE HAS PRODUCED UP to date a minimum of real news and a maximum of rumor and speculation, mostly centering on the man who isn't there—Joseph Stalin. From London and Washington, as well as Quebec, have come a spate of interpretations of the categorical statement by the official Tass agency that Russian participation in the conference "was not and is not envisaged." One popular explanation is that Soviet attendance was ruled out by concentration on Pacific questions. A directly opposite suggestion is that the chief purpose of the meeting is to find ways and means of satisfying Stalin's demand for delivery of a second front, as per contract. Our own view is that Europe is the raison d'etre for the conference, although of course in any discussion of global strategy the problems of one theater have to be related to those of every other. Since the last meeting of Roosevelt and Churchill, it is in Europe that the situation has changed radically. The all but completed capture of the Sicilian gateway, the collapse of Mussolini with its psychological repercussions in Germany, the Russian victories, and the defeat of the U-boats—all these events necessitate a revision of the time-table. Southern Italy, at least, now seems likely to fall into our hands in short order, opening the way to new ventures. But such victories in the Mediterranean arena are of little interest to Stalin unless they force the recall of enough German divisions from the east to make possible a decisive victory there this year. We are inclined to think that time is on our side, but from the Russian point of view we have been borrowing that time from the Red Army, and repayment is due. Until that debt is honored it is clear that little headway will be made in reaching an understanding with Russia about vital post-war issues.

THE MORALE OF A CONSCRIPT ARMY IS interdependent with that of the civilian population from which it springs. Thus the unwillingness of Italian soldiers to go on fighting reflects the war-weariness of the Italian people as a whole. Conversely, the determination with which German troops have fought recently in Russia and Sicily indicates that the morale of the German people, while perhaps increasingly brittle, is still some way from the breaking point. In Italy, Marshal Badoglio, thanks partly to our fumbling of an opportunity, contrived to clamp back the lid on the revolutionary caldron which started to boil over when Mussolini fell. But he has not been able to draw the fires underneath and there are signs that the lid will soon be blown off for keeps. For there is no instrument of coercion to which the Rome government can turn. It has, perforce, been compelled to break up the Fascist Party apparatus in an effort to appease popular feeling. It cannot look to the army to shoot down demonstrators, for the soldiers share too many of the emotions of the mob. However, by stalling the Allies and temporarily restoring "order" Badoglio has gained time, if not for himself, for the Nazis. By all accounts they are digging in along the line of the Po, while in Sicily their rear guard is covering the evacuation of as many men and as much material as possible. When this operation is completed, they will probably abandon southern Italy. Rome will then, perhaps, be more amenable to suggestions of peace, though no longer able to surrender what we need most—control of Lombardy. We shall now have to fight hard for northern Italy. "Anarchy and chaos," which would have impeded the Germans in organizing new defenses, might have served us better.

HOW DID THE STORY GET LAUNCHED THAT Sumner Welles is about to be eased of the burdens of his office? The report appeared simultaneously in the New York Times, the Chicago Tribune, the Washington Times-Herald, and, with the possible exception of papers subscribing to the New York Times news service, nowhere else. The three papers mentioned are all champions of Secretary of State Hull in his long-standing feud with his second in command. Hull himself denied the story of Welles's pending transfer to other duties, but with a degree of circumlocution which left reporters wondering whether there might not be something to it. The net result is that whether or not the State Department is shortly to lose the services of Mr. Welles, his position has already been effectively torpedoed. This achievement has long been a major objective of the Secretary of State, whose repeated injunction to others to keep their eyes on the war has not deflected his own from the interplay of Washington politics. Hull has frequently suggested to his former colleagues in Congress the inadvisability of treating Welles as a policy maker, and ever since his subordinate's advocacy of the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution, relations between the two men have glided from the strained to the impossible. Welles thinks it would be a good idea for Congress to go on record concerning the shape of the peace; Hull fears public debate and thinks the peace should be left to the professionals. The extent of Welles's present eclipse, ironically, is a measure of his growth as a democrat.

ALMOST ANY DAY NOW THE FRENCH WILL become one of our allies. Of course, they have been fighting a long time, have spilled blood for the United Nations on every front and on the seas of both hemispheres —but all that was unofficial. Now they are to be recognized. Britain is ready, the Soviets are eager to the point of irritation, General Eisenhower is reported to regard the move as a military necessity, and even in the State Department voices have been raised in its favor. The formula for recognizing the French Committee of National Liberation is said to have been worked out, and all that remains is for President Roosevelt to give the word. Britain and the United States have been exchanging notes on the subject since July 21, and the delay must already appear to the world as a grudging reluctance to perform a distasteful act. That, in fact, is the more charitable of the prevailing views concerning our procrastination. The other interpretation is that time was necessary to work out a formula with a joker, to wit, recognition of the Committee as a de facto government only up to the moment when French troops land on the soil of continental France. After that what? Presumably we would then recognize a military distatorship under the commander-in-chief of the French forces, namely, General Giraud, or impose Amgot rule on France. Either arrangement would be temporary, lasting only until the holding of a free election. But "temporary" is an elastic word and much can happen while it is being stretched. The prospect of this formula is held out from Algiers rather than Washington, indicating its possible nature as a trial balloon. If that is what it is, it should be exploded with a bang that will be clearly heard in Quebec.

THE LAG IN WAR PRODUCTION THAT HAS been in evidence the last few months has become so serious that it may affect plans now being laid for an intensification of the military effort. Although plane production reached a new high of 7,373 in July, output has fallen far behind schedule. It is clear that the goal of 10,000 planes a month will not be reached this year, and possibly not until well into 1944. A similar lag has afflicted all other branches of war production except shipbuilding, where schedules are being met. Many causes have been cited for this unexpected check on the industrial front. Changes in design, shifts and cancellations of contracts account for some of the delays. There is a belated recognition of failure to take advantage of small-plant facilities for subcontracting. But the principal problem, in the West Coast aircraft factories at least, has been insufficient man-power. During recent months many plants have been losing through the draft, shifts to other jobs, and in other ways as many workers as they have been able to hire. Much of this loss could have been prevented through provision of adequate housing, transpart facilities, day nurseries, and special arrangements for women workers. But in the absence of a carefully worked out man-power program, it is probable that some form of "allocation" of labor may become necessary. The Manpower Commission's new order to reclassify men now in 3-A on the basis of occupation rather than dependency is a timely move in this direction.

THE AGITATION AGAINST THE DRAFTING OF fathers is particularly unfortunate in view of the acute man-power shortage. As the situation now stands, skilled men by the tens of thousands are being withdrawn from essential war industries to meet selective-service quotas. Except for 4-F's and the young men just turning eighteen, no single or childless married men between eighteen and thirty-eight are to be found in most areas who are not in essential jobs. But hundreds of thousands of young fathers, the cream of our physical manhood, are still to be found playing baseball, barbering, running elevators, or doing other non-essential work. The War Manpower Commission does not want to see all of these young fathers in the army, but it does want them to choose between army service and essential civilian occupations. In the absence of a law providing for the conscription of labor, the selective-service act provides the only machinery available for forcing these men into useful work. Several Senators and Congressmen, led by the isolationist Senator Wheeler, are seeking to upset this man-power program by making family responsibility rather than contribution to the war effort the basis of man-power policy. We do not believe that this effort will succeed. But the publicity given to the statements of individual members of Congress who oppose the drafting of fathers on political grounds serves the purposes of the enemy by unnecessarily confusing young fathers regarding their draft status and thus delaying their shift to war industries, where they are badly needed.

PRIME MINISTER MACKENZIE KING BADLY needs any political kudos that can be gleaned from Winston Churchill's visit to Canada, for his Liberal Party is showing many signs of senile decay. On top of a terrific beating in the Ontario provincial elections, it has lost four federal by-elections, two in the West and two in Quebec. In Ontario, it went to the polls with sixty-three out of a total of ninety seats; it emerged with only fourteen. The Conservatives, who have recently sought to widen their appeal by adopting the adjective "Progressive," increased their numbers from twenty-one to thirty-eight. But the real feature of the contest was the advance of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which raised its poll from 60,000 to 360,000 and its seats from none to thirty-four. With no party securing an absolute majority, it seems that the Conservatives will have to patch up some kind of coalition with the Liberal remnant. This may provide a forecast of the political line-up after the next federal election. The C. C. F. is already the strongest party in the West and the following it has secured in its first invasion of industrial Ontario suggests that in English-speaking Canada it will soon be in a position to displace the Liberals. It has not yet been able to make any headway in the province of Quebec, but in this Liberal stronghold Mackenzie King's government is under attack by another foe. In Stanstead, Quebec, the by-election victory won by the newly organized Bloc Populaire is regarded by qualified observers as an indication that this nationalist group will prove a very serious contender at the next general election. Thus threatened from two directions, the Liberal Party, which has ruled Canada through so much of its history as a Dominion, may meet the fate which overtook the British Liberals in 1918.

What About China?

IS FAR EASTERN strategy one of the leading subjects on the Quebec conference agenda? Russia's absence from the meeting has led some commentators to give an affirmative answer to this question. But in this case another question is inevitably raised. Have Chinese representatives been invited to share in the discussions, and if not, why not? China's strategic position in the war against Japan—comparable to Russia's position in the war against Germany—would seem to require Chinese participation in planning the grand strategy of the war in the Far East. We assume that China is being carefully posted on developments through its membership in the Pacific War Council and perhaps through unofficial representation at Quebec. But in the determining of strategy, Chiang Kai-shek's voice is not being heard, except possibly indirectly. As the situation now stands, the United Nations war plan in the Far East is an Anglo-Saxon plan. What excuse can there be for this undeniable fact?

In a recent article in the Reader's Digest Hanson W. Baldwin, military editor of the New York Times, suggests one possible excuse when he argues that China's potential military contribution to the war against Japan is negligible. China, Mr. Baldwin insists, "has as yet no real army . . . most of her troops are poorly led and incapable of effectively utilizing modern arms." There is, unfortunately, a substratum of fact beneath Mr. Baldwin's contentions. China is potentially a strong military nation, but despite the sacrifices of six years of warfare its power is still largely potential. Nevertheless, Mr. Baldwin overstates his case when he discounts recent Chinese victories and dismisses Chinese military strength as inconsequential. On the few occasions when the Chinese have had adequate air support they have shown an offensive capacity that should be recognized in planning the future strategy of the war against Japan. Moreover, it is unwise to ignore the remarkable achievements of Chinese guerrillas merely because they are rarely reported in the American press. The Chinese make excellent soldiers. Provide them with air cover and supplies and they are perfectly capable of driving the Japanese into the sea.

It is doubtful whether Washington or London is worried about the military potential of China. A much more likely basis for concern lies in the persistent reports of serious friction and possible open conflict between the Kuomintang and Eighth Route (Communist) armies. The Chungking government has flatly denied that it plans to take forcible action to dissolve China's Communist Party, as was intimated in a recent article by Vladimir Rogoff which appeared in a Moscow magazine and was extensively quoted in the New York Times. But Chungking did not deny the allegation which was the central thesis of Rogoff's article, namely that "appeasers," "defeatists," and "capitulators" within the Kuomintang ranks have prevented China from building up an adequate war economy within its borders, thus creating a fatal dependence on supplies from abroad. This charge, like Mr. Baldwin's, is doubtless exaggerated, but the resistance encountered over a period of years by so important a factor in the Chinese war effort as the industrial cooperatives indicates that it contains at least a grain of truth.

On the matter of friction betwen the Kuomintang and the Communist armies it is very difficult to obtain wholly reliable information. But as Raymond Gram Swing pointed out in one of his broadcasts last week, it is misleading to think of the Chinese Communists as Marxian proletarians. They are essentially agrarian radicals whose domestic policies are characterized chiefly by attempts to introduce democratic practices and a program of land reform. Contrary to the general supposition, the Chinese Communists have chalked up fully as good a record in the war against Japan as the regular army. T. A. Bisson, writing for the American Council of Pacific Relations, points out that the Eighth and Fourth Route Armies, though constituting only a small proportion of the armies of China, have inflicted two-fifths of the total casualties suffered by the Japanese in 1941 and 1942.

Under the circumstances it is clear that regardless of the rights and wrongs in China's internal political struggle it would be a catastrophe if civil war were to break out. Nor can a continuation of the present armed truce, which has resulted in the withdrawal from combat of half a million central government troops to watch the Eighth Route Army, be regarded as a satisfactory state of affairs. Some way of settling the conflict must be worked out before China can play an offensive role in the war against Japan. But the gulf that separates the contestants is too broad to be easily bridged. The position of the government is simple, and logical. Since there cannot be two governments and two armies in China, the Communists, as the minority, should abandon their separate regime. The Communists have taken the stand that they can afford to do this only if democratic machinery is set up in China which will permit a minority party to function effectively. They also feel that some agrarian reform is essential for getting the mass support demanded by a total war. There is logic in their position.

The solution of the problem is a matter for China alone to discover. Advice on details from this side of the Pacific is likely to be of little value. But it is necessarily of concern to us in the United States, as partners in a common war, that China should work out an early and equitable settlement of its internal conflict, so as to hasten the final defeat of the enemy and the liberation of the Chinese nation.

Some Notes on Harlem

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

BECAUSE the recent trouble in Harlem was not, narrowly speaking, a "race riot," there is a tendency to heave a sigh of relief, compliment the New York City administration for handling it so efficiently, and forget the whole thing. But citizens of the largest city in the country—which ought to set the pace for the intelligent handling of race relations—should consider the Harlem riot not as a closed incident but as a sharp warning. This may sound like alarmist talk. It is, on the contrary, a sober judgment based on the reports of reliable and realistic observers. I am merely summing up their views.

What happened on the night of August 1? A white policeman, James Collins, stationed in the lobby of a hotel which has long been notorious, attempted to arrest a woman, Margie Polite, for using profane language. A Negro military policeman, Robert Bandy, intervened, grabbed the officer's nightstick, and beat Collins over the head with it. I take this account from the Amsterdam News, a leading Negro newspaper. "Bandy then ran out of the hotel and Patrolman Collins shot him in the left shoulder. Collins then placed the soldier under arrest and took him to Sydenham Hospital, with a crowd following. Someone in the crowd shouted, 'A white policeman killed a Negro soldier.' That set off the spark." There followed hours of mob violence in which six people were killed and hundreds injured, while stores were smashed and looted, with damage estimated at more than $5,000,000. Food and liquor stores were special targets.

It was not a race riot, we are told, but there is no question that the violence was primarily directed against whites. The stores attacked were mainly those owned by white people. One young colored woman who mixed with the crowd told me that the people felt they were getting revenge on the storekeepers who sell inferior goods at high prices. Many, no doubt, could not resist the simple desire to get things they wanted and needed—another observer told of a Negro woman who directed her child to get a "spring-mattress" for her because she had always wanted a "spring-mattress"! Then too, looting is infectious, but it would not have assumed such proportions if it had not been fed by long-smoldering resentment against poverty and discrimination. White property was fair game because the people of Harlem firmly believe that white owners have nothing but contempt for the community, never contribute to its welfare financially or otherwise, and are interested only in exploiting colored people.

Much praise has been bestowed upon the city administration for the intelligence and dispatch with which it handled the affair—and much is due—but many Negroes also feel that the riots were in part the cumulative result of a policy of law enforcement in Harlem which has been far too lenient in its handling of day-by-day infractions of ordinary civic decency. It is common knowledge that on the streets of Harlem filthy language, the peddling of dope, the depredations of "baby thugs," sidewalk crap games, the molestation of women who live there, and all the other manifestations of hoodlumism go on continuously—and are largely ignored by policemen who have been told to "go slow" in order to avoid any charge of discrimination or who share the minority psychology that it doesn't matter as long as Negroes are only invading the rights of other Negroes. "Mayor La Guardia," writes one commentator in the Amsterdam News, "referred to the hotel where the trouble started as a 'dive.' Well, if it is a dive why has it been allowed to remain open, with police officers stationed there on a twenty-four-hour watch?" (My italics.) That is a very pertinent question.

So much for the immediate events. What about the fundamental cause? It can be summed up in one word—segregation. All the immediate as well as the intermediate and remote causes of the trouble in Harlem, from high rents to hoodlumism, can be traced back to the Jim Crow mentality, which was bred in the South and has infected the whole country. It is true that the Negro has on the whole received better treatment in New York City than in any other part of the nation. And in a way this very circumstance tends to obscure the ugly fact that Harlem is essentially a black ghetto, created and perpetuated not only by successive migrations of Negroes from the South, where segregation is taken for granted, but by the ignorance, fear, prejudice, indifference—and benevolence—of New York's white majority. Inevitably Harlem has all the characteristics of a ghetto—cultural isolation, economic discrimination, bad housing, overcrowding, exploitation by members of the majority race, a high rate of juvenile delinquency—in short all the evils of the white world in exaggerated form.

I suspect that even enlightened New Yorkers, some of whose best friends are Negroes, seldom face the reality of Harlem. And I suggest that they take a look at that section of their city not as a place where they have fun on Saturday night but as an isolated community where a minority lives and has its being—and stews in its own juice.

At the end of the last war Harlem had a population of some 125,000. Harlem was, indeed, created by World War I. There was a great migration, carried north by the tide of industrial expansion which that war induced. It was, so to speak, a "healthy" migration. There were jobs at the end of the trek. And the people who came to Harlem during those years were assimilated, at least into their city within a city.

In 1943 Harlem has a population of some 400,000; and a great many of the people who have contributed to this increase, particularly in the last ten years, headed north in other, rather ill-starred migrations, propelled by depression. They came looking for jobs, to be sure, but also for relief from hunger and eviction and all the other ills that Negroes in the South are heir to. It stands to reason that many of them were maladjusted, subjectively as well as objectively, in their native communities. In Harlem they found, perhaps not jobs, perhaps only a bed in some relative's already over-crowded flat, but a kind of freedom with poverty in a huge city—which is a perfect set-up for hoodlumism.

In the best of circumstances, it would have been difficult for a community to assimilate this constant stream of newcomers, who hailed, moreover, from backward regions. Add to this the fact that hoodlumism is an old story in any ghetto, and the further fact that police control of a majority over a minority tends toward brutality on the one hand and, on the other, toward a laxity induced by the minority psychology, which I have already mentioned. A Negro may be viciously beaten for molesting a white visitor in Harlem; but decent citizens of Harlem complain that they do not feel safe on the streets of their own community after dark.

The war, of course, has introduced other important and exacerbating factors, both psychological and economic. In normal times segregation breeds a defensive attitude among Negroes that ranges from the militant advocacy of equality to black chauvinism and plain irresponsibility. The war has accentuated these tendencies. It has dramatized for Negroes their position as a minority, creating fresh resentment against all the disabilities of segregation. And these disabilities are glaringly pointed up by the constant discrimination and frequent violence meted out to Negroes in the armed forces of a country that is fighting in the name of democracy. On the economic side, resentment has been increased, not diminished, by such prosperity and status as the war has conferred on colored workers, for where equality does not exist, the demand for it is as easily incited by prosperity as by poverty.

Segregation is, at best, a compromise that white Americans make with their democratic principles and their belief in human dignity. In the long run it not only corrupts both races; it simply does not work, for it perpetuates and intensifies oppression of the minority and it must invariably react against those who impose it.

Harlem is a tragic example of this fact. Another example, even more serious because it is sanctioned by law, is to be found in the practical effects, already observable, of the Supreme Court decision which ordered equal, but not necessarily identical, facilities for Negroes. Negroes now are occasionally admitted to Pullman dining cars—and subjected to the humiliation of being screened from the view of white passengers. And in the far more crucial field of education, that decision has brought about the establishment for Negroes of third-rate graduate professional schools, which insure the isolation of a minority whose one hope of acceptance and integration depends upon free access to the main streams of culture.

It is obvious that the white majority is not yet ready to abandon the disastrous policy of segregation. But whites as well as blacks who have a genuine belief in democracy should understand with their hearts as well as their minds that segregation must be eliminated, and they must advocate immediate policies that contribute toward that end.

In Harlem, for instance, these immediate policies should include, above all, equality in employment and wages, decent housing, an intensive program of social education and rehabilitation and respect for the rights of the individual. It should include also a policy of law enforcement which will be as strict against the ordinary infractions of public behavior in Harlem as it is in other parts of the city. We may be sure that the great majority of citizens in Harlem would support such a policy, for leniency in this regard is only discrimination in reverse.

As for Negroes, they too have a responsibility, and their most intelligent spokesmen have been the first to say so. While insisting steadily on equality, Negro leaders must impress upon their followers the fact that law and order, impartially and decently administered and scrupulously observed, are the principal safeguard of any minority.

Pay for Your Own Inflation

BY JEROME WEINSTEIN

LIKE an advancing forest fire, inflationary price increases spurt through the dry tinder of excess purchasing power. And just as a forest fire grown out of hand is brought under control by a back fire, deliberately set to burn out an area ahead of the advancing blaze, so can inflation, artificially created and properly controlled, be used to check the ravages of an uncontrolled inflation.

Price increases initiated and regulated by the government can be substituted for inflation. This artificial inflation may be used to bring supply and demand into balance in a way that will accomplish the following desirable social objectives: (1) allocation of the burden of inflated prices to those who indulge in excess spending; (2) transformation into government revenues of the price increases, which otherwise would constitute unearned profits for those who deal in consumers' goods; and (3) assurance to every individual of his essential share of vital necessities at uninflated prices.

By such artificial inflation the forces of supply and demand can be made to play their functional part in the machinery of distribution—machinery which is now near collapse despite price ceilings, rationing, and subsidies.

Prices are rising because the amount of money people are willing and able to spend for goods exceeds the aggregate value of these goods at current prices. Such increases due to excess demand result in increased profits and normally stimulate additional production, which restores a balance between supply and demand at some lower price level. But in the present circumstances, when the resources which can be devoted to the production of consumers' goods are necessarily limited, this stimulus of additional profits cannot call forth the usual response of increased supply. This is what makes inflation.

Can we stabilize prices on a level at which demand exceeds supply? Not so long as the inexorable law of supply and demand continues to operate. And it will continue to operate while the facilities of distribution are privately owned and operated. For within the framework of a price-and-profit economy, we cannot legislate against the forces which make it function. Price-control measures will be effective within that framework only to the extent that they increase supply or reduce demand. Price ceilings do the reverse, tending to increase demand. To the extent that they are effective they enable people to purchase more goods. In the same way, price roll-backs, which operate only as subsidies to consumers, tend to increase the unbalance between demand and supply by increasing the purchasing power of money.

Rationing, to the extent that it is effective, does reduce demand. However, rationing is effective only at the subsistence level at which all consumers are equal. But we have to deal with a substantial surplus of goods over and above the bare minimum for existence. On what basis is that surplus to be distributed? If it is left to supply and demand, the higher prices paid for the surplus will inevitably create a black market in the goods which should be sold at subsistence price levels, and if we attempt to distribute this surplus through an equal rationing, we face the obvious fact that the privilege of buying and the financial means required for the exercise of that privilege are materially different things.

Price increases reduce effective demand by driving out of the market those marginal buyers who are unable or unwilling to pay the higher price; those who can and will pay more find the purchasing power of their money reduced. This happens regardless of the cause of price increases. A sales tax which adds 20 per cent to the cost of goods will drive out marginal buyers and reduce the purchasing power in the same way as a 20-per-cent rise caused by inflationary demand. To the extent that any price increase, however caused, uses up purchasing power, it eliminates that purchasing power as a continuing force of effective demand.

A general sales tax could be used to increase artificially the prices of consumer goods to the level that would otherwise be reached if inflationary demand were left unchecked. But those price increases would accrue to the government by way of tax revenues instead of constituting unearned profits. The hardship to a consumer who pays a dollar a pound for steak, including sales tax, is no greater than the hardship of paying the same price because of excess demand.

The objection to such use of a general sales tax is that, like uncontrolled inflation, it falls upon the just and unjust alike. It burdens consumption at the subsistence level as heavily as consumption at a luxury level. It fails to distinguish between the pound of meat that is an absolute necessity and the pound of meat that is bought with extravagant spending. It stabilizes prices at the expense of the poor for the benefit of the rich. A tax that cuts the poor man's consumption by a third will not check the appetites of the wealthy. And what goods the poor man cannot buy because of the tax will become available for the rich to consume.

The use of a general sales tax to inflate prices artificially will, except for the tax revenues to be derived, bring with it all the evils of inflation itself. It will not limit the burden of increased prices to those whose excessive spending has caused the price increase. Nor will it assure to every individual the opportunity to buy his essential share of the necessities of life at uninflated price levels. Any acceptable method of artificial inflation must, if possible, do these things.

Can a solution for the problem be found by exempting food or clothing from the sales tax? This would only divert spending from the taxed fields of expenditure into the untaxed fields of expenditure. It would further increase the demand, and consequently the prices, for these goods, and thus defeat its own purpose.

The end in view, however, could be achieved by a direct and currently payable tax upon the use of purchasing power in excess of an exempt minimum amount. The tax would progressively increase in rate to the point necessary to achieve a balance between spending and available goods. It would apply to those consumers' goods which by price increases reflect the pressure of excessive inflationary demand—primarily food, clothing, and household goods. Exemption would be given to an amount deemed adequate to cover the cost of goods required for subsistence.

Under this plan there would be issued to every individual coupons covering the exempt amount. Such coupons in money denominations would be used in the purchase of goods in the same way that ration coupons are now used. In the event that the consumer wanted more coupons, he would be required to purchase them, at progressively higher rates. For instance, the first $200 of extra coupons could be taxed at the rate of $20 a hundred; the next $200 at $35 a hundred; and the next $200 at $50 a hundred. The more an individual spent for foods and other taxed goods, the more he would be required to pay in taxes and the less would be the purchasing power of his money. The tax would represent an increase in the price of necessities at the point where they start to be consumed as luxuries. In this way the tax would equalize the competition between higher and lower income groups for the same goods. Retailer collection of coupons could be made certain by requiring their submission along with stock-replacement orders. The retailer who failed to collect coupons could not replenish his stocks and would soon be out of business.

To assure the priority of demands based on essential consumption, wholesalers would be required to give a preference to such retailers' orders as were supported by exempt coupons, which would have a distinctive color. This would assure to every individual his essential share of the necessities of life at uninflated prices. Both free and taxed coupons would be issued for periods of two or three months in order to prevent hoarding. If coupons were issued on an annual basis, there would be a rush of anticipatory buying to guard against the contingency of inflationary price increases a year hence.

The use of a periodic basis would also give that flexibility which is essential to any control of excess buying. As our reserve stock of consumers' goods disappears, the inflationary gap continues to widen. By lowering or raising a ceiling on the maximum amount of extra coupons which could be purchased within any one period, it would be possible to restrict spending above the subsistence level to the amount of goods then available.

The progressive taxation of excess spending would in itself serve as a flexible, self-rationing measure. Each consumer would ration and adjust his periodic, tax-exempt purchasing power to satisfy his own particular demands. He would not sacrifice his ability to buy food without payment of a tax in order to buy a pair of shoes for which he had no immediate need. This restriction on spending would make it possible to dispense with much of the specific rationing now in effect.

The rationing of those few commodities of which there existed an absolute shortage could be continued. Special ration coupons could be included in each book of free coupons. In this way it would be possible to administer the rationing of all such commodities by a single comprehensive scheme.

A black market in free coupons is not likely, for such coupons would merely suffice to cover a subsistence level of expenditure. A black market in extra coupons could be effectively checked. Every individual might be required to present his pass book in order to purchase extra coupons, and the amount of each purchase would be entered therein. He could also be required to file his pass book with his income-tax return. Discrepancies between expenditure and income would be obvious and create a situation every taxpayer would seek to avoid.

The method here proposed balances supply with demand by depreciation of the purchasing power of money used for excess spending. The tax becomes a progressive discount rate which the state applies currently to dollars used for purchases beyond a subsistence level. The thousandth dollar spent buys less than the six-hundredth dollar spent and still less than the first dollar spent.

The same depreciation of purchasing power would occur with inflation. As more and more money would be spent, it would become worth less and less in terms of goods. Thus the proposed tax is equivalent to inflation in its effect upon prices and upon the aggregate demand of all consumers. It differs from inflation in that, by the use of exemptions and progressive rates, the burden of higher prices is distributed in accordance with ability to pay. At the same time, it gives the state a source of substantial revenue.

This is inflation à la carte. Each consumer will create his own private measure of inflation. The price increases which he must pay are to be determined by his own spending. He cannot impose upon others the burden of price increases caused by his excessive demands on a limited supply of goods. The cost of inflation is placed, as it should be, upon those who cause it. This is the inflation that can beat inflation.

"The Beginning of the End"

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

SELDOM has President Roosevelt made a more prophetic statement than his reference to the successful invasion of Sicily as marking "the beginning of the end." Less than a year after El Alamein and Stalingrad, the high-water marks of German power, the close of the war is clearly in sight. Today the enemies of the Axis stand in the best military position since 1939.

If the President's statement is to be criticized from any angle, it is incorrect in that it appears to attribute to action on one front—the southern European—credit that belongs to many and diverse factors. For the military position in which we now find ourselves rests not on any one success, but rather on a combination of triumphs on every front.

Almost overlooked in the midst of more dramatic events has been the victory in the Atlantic, which has permitted a concentration of greater man-power and munitions of war in Western Europe. The battle of ship production has now clearly been won. When a wolf-pack of twenty-five German submarines loses three of its members without being able to approach a convoy close enough to fire a torpedo, it is a sign that the battle of the Atlantic is turning against the Axis. And our turnout of anti-submarine weapons has not yet reached its peak.

The German bid for victory in Russia has fared no better. Slight gains might reasonably have been anticipated from the attempt to reduce the Kursk salient—made in considerable force and under favorable conditions. The utter failure of this offensive is a portent for the future. The heavy losses of man-power, the dispersion and weakening of German air strength, combined with the enormous improvements in Russian organization and tactics, have produced a new situation. The Red Army is qualitatively superior to the Wehrmacht, and it almost certainly has greater reserves. Even the digging-in process which has accompanied the change from Blitzkrieg warfare to that of attrition has not prevented the Red Army, in its turn, from launching successful offensives in areas strategically vital to Germany. Though these have been undertaken in superior force, they have not resulted in any serious weakening of Russian defenses elsewhere, as the Germans have learned to their cost after trying diversionary attacks. The long and unbroken retreat out of Russia which marked the doom of Napoleon is now well under way in the case of Hitler. And, as in the Battle of the Atlantic, time is now on the side of the Allies. The Russians are becoming stronger as Germany's strength ebbs. Already there is a suggestion of demoralization in the German retreat.

In the air, too, the United Nations are winning the war. Losses in June were so heavy that some critics feared the margin of profit in aerial bombing had been wiped out. However, during a lull of several weeks, a shift was made in command, squadrons were regrouped, and a new technique was worked out. The late July and early August raids were then undertaken in record-breaking force. More distant penetrations of Germany were made without a proportionate increase of losses. Even in repeated saturation raids on the same target, such as those over Hamburg, not attempted earlier for fear of too heavy loss, the number of British planes downed ranged only from 4 to 5 per cent. The far more accurate precision work of the Americans, directed at such targets as oil refineries and synthetic rubber plants, has further cut down Germany's industrial output. There is widespread difference of opinion as to whether bombing alone can win the war, but there is no possible denial that our present campaign is steadily reducing Germany's industrial and military potential. And it will be conducted in far greater force in the months directly ahead. These are the three major fronts in the European struggle. In none of them is there the remotest likelihood that the Axis will be able to reverse the trend.

It is nevertheless in Sicily and Italy that the growing weakness of the Axis has been most clearly shown. The invasion of Sicily was expected to result in Allied success. With sea and air superiority, better supply lines, a higher grade of troops, and proved leadership on our side, nothing else was possible. What was startling was the rapidity of the early gains, the physical and moral collapse of Italian resistance, and the swift political repercussions in Italy. Equally marked was the improvement in the American armed forces. Our armies have come a long way since their fights in Tunisia. Hitler's refusal even to attempt defending the entire Italian peninsula, while perfectly sound strategically, was the first clear admission of defeat made by official quarters in Germany. Long overmatched at sea and in the air, the Germans, by deciding to contract their lines of defense on land, made a most significant confession of inferiority.

The conquest of Sicily opens up new offensive possibilities for an Italian campaign, with a penetration into the Balkans or southern France following success on the peninsula. This drive might be undertaken in considerable strength, for the divisions used by Eisenhower were clearly only the spearhead of much larger armies available, of forces in the Mediterranean theater which the Germans estimated at fifty-nine to sixty-four divisions. These forecasts are based on the assumption that Italy will not escape the German yoke. Should it decide to capitulate, the outlook would be even more favorable for the Allies.

Of even greater importance than our military gains, striking as they have been, are the psychological effects on Hitler-occupied Europe. The satellite powers have grown increasingly restless and uncooperative, and conquered peoples everywhere are encouraged to continue and intensify their resistance. German man-power, already strained by the Russian war, is certain to prove ever more inadequate to keep subject peoples in control, protect against invasion at many points, and at least supervise and direct slave labor. For nearly two years people in western Germany have been promised protection and revenge on England "once Russia is disposed of." American aid was to be kept at arm's length by the U-boats. Goebbels in both cases has been forced to admit failure. Even a people as docile and well regimented as the Germans must sometimes recall unfulfilled promises. For an entire year all military news has been bad news. As the casualty lists lengthen, with only Nazi defeats to show for them, the time is rapidly passing when an intelligent German can expect anything but eventual defeat. No propaganda on earth can succeed under such circumstances. In terms of World War I, we have reached the July, 1918, stage, when the last great German drive fell short of victory and only an exhausted, bleeding homeland, sure of failure, starved by four years of Allied blockade, and ready for moral collapse, remained back of the German lines.

It is time for our war leaders to recognize the fact that conditions in Europe have changed drastically from the days when overwhelming Axis power made cautious, limited offensives advisable. A Germany convinced of defeat, inferior in the air, weakened by blockade, bled white by four years of war, with many industries, transport lines, and ports in ruins, is a far different antagonist from the Germany of 1939, 1940, or even 1941. As the Sicilian campaign showed, the number of enemy divisions under such circumstances is completely meaningless. If we wish to shorten the war, now is the time to strike. Propaganda, air power, sea power, military forces must all be utilized to the utmost and in locations vital to the Axis. Denmark, the Low Countries, northern France all offer more crucial battlefields than Italy, southern France, or the Balkans. It is, of course, hardly possible, unless such plans have already been made, to improvise a successful attack in these areas. What is to be hoped is that our war planners, remembering the maxim of Napoleon that "the moral is to the material as three is to one," have anticipated the present situation and are preparing to open a third front which will afford possibilities for bringing the war to an early end.

Italy and the Pessimists

BY LOUIS GRABER

MUSSOLINI'S fall has raised problems which go to the root of the peace and the future of European democracy. To recognize these problems and to solve them correctly is obviously the most urgent task of democrats everywhere. For on their farsightedness and political sagacity rests the decision as to who will pluck the fruits of our military victories—the forces of progress or a more or less disguised reaction. But the revolution in Italy, the first great crack in the structure of fascist Europe, has plainly caught world democracy off guard.

The liberals of America are pessimistic—too pessimistic. They have seen the forces of reaction conquering one stronghold after another, in part because of the cowardice of "realists" and their willingness to compromise. It is understandable that many liberals have in consequence become doubly suspicious of all maneuvers and compromises. But their fearfulness has been carried too far. To suspect, a priori, every victory gained by democracy, to make pessimism a political philosophy, is to undermine the forces of progress and sow confusion. This shortsightedness in the camp of the sincere liberals and the convinced anti-fascists may well have more dangerous results than all the intrigues and master plans that the various pseudo-Metternichs carry around in their vest pockets.

The weakness of the left has emerged glaringly in its failure to estimate correctly the present Italian situation. Many of our progressive columnists declared themselves disappointed. One called the fall of Mussolini "the first cousin of the recent Argentine coup d'état." Another found fault with the fact that Mussolini had not been overthrown by a popular movement, but merely by a palace revolution. A third complained that it was not the forces of anti-fascism, but rather the military defeats, that had forced Il Duce to abdicate. But on one point they all agree: that the King and Badoglio, far from being democrats, are accomplices of fascism.

About this last point no argument is possible. In analyzing a political situation, however, it isn't enough to observe merely the gestures and actions of the men who pass themselves off as the leading actors but who are in reality lowly extras. Was what happened in Italy only a palace revolution, provoked by our military victories? Of course; but it was the anti-fascist convictions of the Italian masses, their resistance to the Mussolini régime, which caused the military machine to crumble and made it ripe for defeat. No revolution has ever occurred out of a blue sky. Before the people can act it is necessary for the ruling régime first to document its own bankruptcy.

Naturally the ruling clique will try to divert the revolution from its path and save itself by means of compromises and intrigues, and to recognize and expose these deceptions is important. But it is equally important to preserve one's perspective and to place the Italian coup d'état in its true relation to the pattern of current events.

The two weeks that have elapsed since Mussolini's fall, we are assured from quarters that should know better, have substantiated the worst fears of the pessimists: "Nothing has changed in Italy!" This way of thinking shows a complete disregard of the real motivating powers of the Italian revolution. What, then, has changed? Only that Italian fascism has publicly announced its bankruptcy, shown itself incapable even of arousing itself to the empty gesture of a heroic exit. Only that in spite of a dictatorship of twenty years' duration, in spite of propaganda and secret police, in spite of jail and castor oil and concentration camps, the Italian masses dashed to the streets in the very first hour, shouting "Long live democracy!" Only that a mere four hours after Mussolini's resignation, manifestos, pamphlets, and newspapers appeared, testifying to the force of Italian democracy and the unity of the anti-fascist front.

I am not even mentioning here the military results of the overthrow and its possible effects on the future course of the war. Like The Nation, I believe that "the political results may be more valuable," though not just "for the Allied cause," but for the entire development of the anti-fascist battle in Europe. It is precisely this side of the question that is being completely overlooked by many spokesmen of democracy. And this seems to me a dangerous symptom, a symptom of the sectarianism and false radicalism that have come to take root in the ranks of the left, a symptom of its lack of self-confidence.

How else did people imagine the revolution in Italy would occur? And what preconceptions have they now concerning the coming revolution in Germany? Did they expect a democratic government to follow close on the heels of Hitler, the "black night of barbarism" to be succeeded instantaneously by the "resplendent dawn of liberty"? The revolutions that will follow the collapse of fascism and nazism in Europe will not run a straight course. And we must shape our strategy and tactics accordingly.

I hope that no one will conclude from these remarks that I have the faintest esteem for the Badoglio régime or even advocate our coming to terms with it. My contention is simply that this interregnum should prove an unwitting blessing to Italian democracy and the struggle against fascism.

From the first, Badoglio has had only two possibilities from which to choose: to capitulate or to continue the war on the side of Germany. Should he surrender unconditionally, his régime will be completely identified with the defeat. Italian democracy really has no reason to compete with the marshal for undertaking this nasty job of liquidation. How much better it would have been for the course of democracy in Germany if in 1918 Hindenburg and Ludendorff, rather than Ebert and Scheidemann, had formalized the capitulation!

Should Badoglio make the second choice, which he clearly appears to have done, who can doubt that his effort to carry on the fight must very soon end with his downfall and that he will drag the monarchy down with him? This course will in fact provide the best method for converting to the cause of democracy and a free republic even those conservative elements in the Italian population which for sentimental reasons still cling to the monarchy.

The parties that are united in the Italian anti-fascist front have seen the situation clearly. They did not rush to demand the fall of the King and Badoglio. In their very first manifesto they demanded a break with Germany, peace, guarantees of the basic democratic rights, and the liberation of all political prisoners. The Communists did not talk of soviets; the Republicans made no mention of a republic; and the Socialists said nothing about socialism. Instead, they found a common platform and demonstrated their ability to think and act with clear political judgment.

Unfortunately, the same cannot be said of some of our democratic theorists, whose attitude has been determined primarily by resentment and moral indignation over the personal histories of Victor Emanuel and Marshal Badoglio. It may be readily admitted that the sentiment of these liberals is praiseworthy and their indignation understandable, but the fact that our progressive columnists and the Italian exiles have no illusions about Badoglio and the King happens to be immaterial. The great majority of the Italian people immediately after Mussolini's fall thought that the King and his Marshal had freed them of fascism and would bring them peace. It is essential that they be cured of these illusions. They are in fact being cured, but after twenty years of dictatorship time is obviously needed for political truths to penetrate.

This loss of time—which in any case will be very limited—is more than offset by the fact that when the Badoglio government falls, no Italian will be able to say that the Allies wantonly overthrew "an upright man and a great soldier" merely because he did not suit their purposes. On the contrary, the downfall of the régime will clearly reflect its failure to fulfill the will of the Italian people.

It is true that Badoglio's hesitation has given the Germans time to consolidate their power in northern Italy, and it is good propaganda to hammer home that fact to the Italian people. But in reality no Italian government would have been able to prevent this development. The preparation and execution of adequate military operations to checkmate the Nazis would have required time no matter who was in control.

But, it is protested, is there not a grave danger that a Badoglio who accepts the conditions of the Allies and is in turn supported by them will stabilize his régime and the pro-fascist monarchy, thus barring the way to the construction of a true democracy? This fear, too, shows a lack of understanding. Even if it adopted a pseudo-democratic course, Badoglio's administration could only be temporary. The enormous problems posed by twenty years of fascism and by defeat will grow increasingly complicated. Only a genuinely democratic government supported by the entire population can solve these problems. Where fascism, which could embellish its dictatorship with a pseudo-social and pseudo-revolutionary ideology, failed, a naked military dictatorship is even less equipped to block the democratic process of rejuvenation. And a beaten military dictatorship has no chance at all.

I don't believe in the theory that the liberated nations will be confronted with a "political vacuum." The fall of the dictators will doubtless bring to the helm transient régimes à la Badoglio—generals in Germany, more or less reactionary politicians in Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania. These régimes will attempt to save themselves by making concessions to democracy. The victorious powers will, out of pure self-interest and military necessity, occupy these countries, enforce disarmament, and liquidate the police machines. With the annihilation of the fascist and Nazi political structures and provision for the basic requirements of an expression of the popular will, the military governments and armies of occupation will have completely fulfilled their historic task. If public opinion in the democracies sees to it that they stop then and there, everything else can be safely left to the people of the liberated countries.

England Teaches Its Soldiers

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

"YOU will find the troops very critical," the educational officer told me, somewhat apologetically, as he ushered me into a cavernous assembly hall deep in the side of the cliffs. I was on a speaking tour of British army camps, and the assignment on the first day was a coast-guard battalion on the south coast. The topic was the reconstruction of Europe after the war. The British army has gone in not only for education, but for progressive education. I was asked by the officer to make the opening address brief so that there would be sufficient time for discussion. The discussion was lively and to the point. I did find the troops critical, sometimes to the point of deep skepticism about the possibility of any significant post-war reconstruction.

The first question in this discussion period came from a sergeant. "Do you think," he asked, "that white nations that allow conditions which produce Detroit race riots are capable of reconstructing the world in such a way that the colored nations will have their just place in the scheme of things?" The question led to some critical estimates of the virtues and capacities for world statesmanship to be found in the United Nations. I sought in the discussion to discover whether the remarks were primarily expressions of British resentment against color prejudice in the American army or an indication of a wholesome sense of the common guilt of all the white nations. I discovered that both moods were present in fairly equal proportions.

The British soldiers are not at all afraid to ask, and are capable of asking, questions which deal critically with the ideas and attitudes, the policies and program of their own nation. I was sometimes informed that the critical attitude of the British army was caused by the years of frustration spent in home camps, waiting and training for the invasion of Europe. It seems to me more likely that it is the consequence of the very wide and extensive program of social and political education conducted by British army authorities. The soldiers' questions invariably indicated a general background of informed opinion. In a week of forums, not a silly question was asked. The only irrelevant questions were those dealing with the wide differential in wages between British and American soldiers, an unfortunate source of friction between the two armies, which Canada has wisely eliminated by withholding a part of the troops' wages through forced savings.

The British army is prepared to let education leaven the lump of army discipline. Again and again educational officers told me that they began their work under a cloud of suspicion on the part of general officers, who were afraid that free discussion of the causes and probable consequences of the war might distract soldiers from that single-minded devotion to the immediate task which army discipline requires. But they usually reported that the field officers were ultimately converted by the improved morale of the troops. I did hear of some cases in which field officers were able to emasculate the educational program, making it both innocuous and uninteresting. Yet the fact is that, on the whole, the British army is not afraid of education for democracy, while our own army shows every indication of harboring such fears.

A part of the British educational scheme dates from 1920, when the Army Education Corps was organized on the basis of a special report issued by a committee under the chairmanship of Lord Gorell. The present educational program is carried on inside the army under the supervision of a Directorate of Education in the War Office, and the Education Corps has its special officers in every district, area, and divisional headquarters. The actual classes and forums are usually conducted by warrant officers in regimental and battalion units. A special premium is placed upon discussion, and the officers are asked to report the length of each discussion and the number of participants.

In 1939 a Central Advisory Council for Adult Education in His Majesty's Forces was organized, consisting of representatives of the universities, the Board of Education, and local educational authorities. The council, which is subdivided into twenty-three regional units, renders the best educational talent of the nation available for the task of army education. I know of no similar body in our own country; and I have the uneasy feeling that the failure of American educators to interest themselves in the problem of army education is responsible to a large degree for the comparative educational backwardness of the American army. The Educational Corps and the Advisory Council route a large number of lecturers through the army camps. The educational officers are also encouraged to make use of whatever talent is to be found within their respective units. Frequently, regular army officers are drawn into the educational program, and ex-journalists and teachers within the ranks are used according to their several abilities.

In addition, the Y. M. C. A. carries on a general, as well as religious, educational program. Frequently, in sections where there are many camps, the Y. M. C. A. provides a special educational center, different in atmosphere from the regular camp, and organizes special classes for soldiers. Part of the Y. M. C. A. educational program is conducted by women, who have for various reasons, some of them obvious, proved particularly acceptable to the troops.

The "textbooks" for the social and political education of soldiers are of two varieties. A series of pamphlets with the general heading, "British Way and Purpose," discusses all aspects of British democratic history, of present political, economic, and social problems, and of future prospects. A special Army Bureau of Current Affairs publishes a weekly bulletin in which current problems are analyzed and questions suitable for discussion suggested. The special problems of practically every nation and region of the world have been taken up by the A. B. C. A. While it was reported that some officers tried to discourage discussion of the Beveridge Report, I can testify that I visited no educational center which did not display a large graph illustrating the meaning of the Beveridge social-security plan. Many British soldiers asked me whether we had a similar plan and were surprised when I told them of the report of the National Resources Planning Board.

Aside from the general educational program, every kind of individual interest is encouraged and facilities are provided for constructive hobbies. I discovered a class in Esperanto in one unit, and in another an educational officer reported that special phonograph records had been provided for a group especially interested in chamber music.

Compared with this British program, the United States Army is culturally and educationally poverty-stricken, though it is not poor in any other respect. In Britain, the American Red Cross carries on the activities which are performed in the United States by the USO and there are Red Cross clubs in every part of the British Isles for our soldiers. There is no lack of entertainment. Moving pictures and theatrical performances are plentiful. American soldiers can get unlimited amounts of cigarettes tax free, while British soldiers are limited to five tax-free cigarettes a day. Naturally, chocolate bars are also more plentiful among our service men.

The United States Army in Britain publishes both a daily paper and a weekly magazine, both of which are very sprightly. The paper not only carries baseball box scores but has a daily photo of some glamor queen, usually a Hollywood star. The regular publication of these pictures is presumably for the purpose of providing "pin-ups" to enliven the bare walls of the barracks. In short, nothing is lacking in the United States Army except serious discussion about the meaning of the war and the best means of using the fruits of victory creatively.

Some American officers and soldiers who came to my public meetings in London told me that there was absolutely no opportunity in the army for serious talk about social and political issues. I discovered that this is not exactly true; but it is broadly true. There are, of course, the orientation courses given during the soldiers' training period, some of which are very good but most of which are mediocre. Moreover, the personnel of the Special Services division of the army, which is in charge of the activities that beguile a soldier's leisure, does boast two special officers in charge of education, as well as a number of officers who, impressed by the British program, are emulating the discussion groups of the British army, as are also some of the Red Cross clubs.

Nevertheless, these casual and individual efforts are piddling compared with the highly organized British system. An education program cannot be effective in the army if it is not launched under auspices that have indisputable prestige, if it is not carried through systematically to the various units, and if it lacks proper literature. There is no indication that our army contemplates such a program.

Perhaps it ought to be added that the British chaplains have been drawn into the educational program through the institution of a "padre's hour" in which the chaplain presides over an informal discussion in which no serious subject is barred. Our chaplains, on the other hand, are limited to formal religious services. Except for a few specially talented chaplains, this means that their contact with the troops is minimal. The British army is now initiating institutes in sex education and seeking to make the guidance of both chaplains and educational officers on this important subject more effective. I lack official data in regard to our own army, but such evidence as I was able to gather informally gave me the impression that there is little in the way of sex guidance between the chaplain's rather too simple prohibitions and the medical officer's rather too simple prophylaxis.

An army fighting for democracy without a full opportunity to discuss the meaning of the struggle in which it is engaged may easily become a peril to democracy. This is true because army techniques and procedures are highly specialized; and all highly specialized preoccupations are a potential peril to a form of government that requires for its preservation broad perspectives and an understanding of ultimate issues. It is natural for field officers to be skeptical of, and on occasion inimical to, democratic education in the army. They naturally fear any distraction which might beguile the soldier from his immediate task. But it is precisely because military discipline conduces to a narrow outlook that democracy insists upon the subordination of military to civil authority. In the field of education, this subordination has not been preserved in the United States Army. The American soldier has Hollywood, in both the literal and symbolic sense, to fill his leisure hours; but he lacks help in finding the spiritual and moral significance of the titanic struggle in which he is engaged. We may one day rue this neglect of the substance of democracy in democracy's army.

However, "he is having his troubles in trying to persuade competent business men to take over the key jobs. . . . POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Last Hour

THE sixth meeting between President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill takes place in an atmosphere of unlimited confidence, with good news pouring in from every military front. If the conference has been greeted not with unanimous joy but with a general feeling of skepticism, it is because our deep satisfaction in the impending doom of the Axis cannot preclude our concern over the political developments of the war. Until now we have had a political setback for every military achievement, and the disparity grows more apparent as the victorious armies draw closer to their goal.

The Italian crisis is the most immediate issue facing the conference. Recently, perhaps in a mood of summer irresponsibility, a high Allied dignitary remarked that the Italian state of affairs concerned military staffs exclusively. It cannot be assumed that the President and the Prime Minister share this view. It would be interesting to know whether, in the intimacy of the conversations between the two leaders, Mr. Churchill has shown himself as well satisfied with the manner in which the Italian crisis has been handled in Washington and London as official circles would pretend.

Here in the United States we have indulged in a good deal of self-deception. Even commentators who did not spare their criticism in discussing the blunders committed in North Africa were prompt to say that no better action could have been taken in Italy, and that to speak of the creation of a free Italian government, opposed to the King and Badoglio, was both childish and dangerous. People in London seem to know better. Authoritative voices have revealed growing uneasiness as Italy has continued to play the German game, and they have marked the loss of a magnificent opportunity for the United Nations, with the help of the Italian people, to rouse the anti-fascist masses of Europe.

Judging by authentic reports which trickle out of Italy, the popular movement against the war and against the King and Badoglio, the reaction to the farce of dissolving fascism by law even while securing its power, has reached an extraordinary intensity. What would have been the effect upon the masses demonstrating in Milan and Turin if real anti-fascist Italians had addressed them from Sicily? Perhaps the leaders at the Anglo-American conference feel satisfied that their chief objective has been attained—the preservation of order and the avoidance of revolution. But not even Mr. Churchill's fertile imagination can make a political success out of a situation created by the lack of a clear democratic policy.

As in all the previous Churchill-Roosevelt conferences, Russia will be "kept fully informed" of all decisions, and that, regrettably, will be the extent of its participation. It was made to appear after the earlier meetings in Washington and Casablanca that everything pointed to a perfect agreement among the United Nations. After the landing in Sicily even the controversial issue of a second front seemed to be settled. But it is now evident that the only road to a genuine accord is acceptance of the Russian interpretation of a second front.

The differences between the Soviet Union, the United States, and Great Britain may be slighter than they were some months ago. But it is not encouraging to hear the people who a year ago talked of the possibility of a separate Russo-German peace emerging again with the same argument. Nor is it a sign of genuine collaboration among the three great powers that the creation of a Free German Committee in Moscow has inspired diverse schemes to outwit the Russians in Berlin.

The Soviet Union has three complaints against its Western allies: military commitments made but not fulfilled; delay in the recognition of the French Committee of National Liberation; assumption that the military and civil administration of Italian occupied territories, beginning with Sicily, is a purely American-British affair.

Of the three problems, the second was the easiest to solve. The Russians simply served notice that if the Algiers committee were not recognized by Britain and the United States in the near future, the Soviet government would take such action on its own account. A belated victory was won—but not before the prestige of Washington had sadly fallen, and not before the status of General de Gaulle had become almost a question of American national honor.

Russia may eventually be fully satisfied on the other two issues. But there will be further problems out of which major divergencies among the United Nations may arise. As long as the problems are aggravated by mutual rivalry and distrust, we shall emerge from one crisis only to enter another. Now, at this advanced stage of the war, the London Observer finds it necessary to urge the creation of a political council of the United Nations and to warn that this is the last hour to unite. For two years this has been the constant plea of everyone with enough imagination to foresee a certain military victory and an almost certain political defeat. Every plea proved useless. The United Nations were strong. One day the irresistible force of Allied armies would force the Axis to its knees, and anything said in regard to the political aspect of the struggle was sheer impertinence and a hindrance to the war effort.

But the problems remained. They will either be accorded a politically adequate solution or all the 21 million tons of American shipping announced for 1944, all the fabulous production of planes and tanks, and all the richness of the arsenal of democracy will be insufficient to bring peace on earth. The status quo among the United Nations cannot be maintained indefinitely by intermittent smiles and reproaches. The choice is between an immediate unity of Russia, the United States, and Great Britain on political strategy and war aims, or eventual open conflict. J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Mr. Hull's Bad Dream

BY PAUL WINKLER

THE French Committee of National Liberation held a meeting in Algiers today, deliberating whether it should recognize the State Department as a body representing American interests. General Giraud defended the point of view that though there was no necessity for a so-called "full recognition," it should seriously be taken into consideration whether the State Department did not deserve a "provisional recognition," or at least a "de facto recognition."

General de Gaulle said that the State Department could not be recognized by the committee because, according to confidential information he had received, the source of which he could not reveal, "there was no State Department" and consequently it could not be said yet with certainty whether there was a United States of America at all. He added that according to Dr. Gallup 95 per cent of the Americans were not for the State Department and to regard as representative of American interests a body which has behind it only 5 per cent of all Americans was quite impossible.

General Giraud answered that, according to his figures, 95 per cent of all Americans were backing the State Department. Asked to explain where he got his figures, Giraud said he was not quite sure whether they were from the Fortune poll or the Gettysburg Address, and added that the latter document was, from what he had heard, of great importance for Americans and should always be mentioned by anyone speaking about American affairs.

The State Department, M. André Philip then proposed, should be told first to achieve unity among its own leaders before applying for any recognition. From reliable American newspaper reports, he could announce that Mr. Cordell Hull did not get along well with Mr. Sumner Welles and did not like Mr. Adolf Berle; Mr. Sumner Welles did not like Mr. Hull and Mr. Berle; and Mr. Berle liked only himself. M. René Massigli, speaking about Mr. Berle, said that a man who, according to American magazines, has two tubs in his bathroom cannot be regarded as a representative statesman anyhow.

M. André Philip then submitted to the meeting a confidential message which he had just received through underground channels from Washington. According to this message, it was certain that Mr. Roosevelt was either a Fascist or a Communist, but it was not yet clear which. Some Americans insisted that the OWI and the FCC were full of Communists, and others that the State Department was full of Fascists, and because these offices had been created by President Roosevelt there was a good chance that he might be both Fascist and Communist. M. Philip understood that a secret debate on this subject was just going on between Representative Martin Dies and Miss Elsa Maxwell.

M. André Philip then asked how the State Department could seriously ask for recognition so long as its policies were determined entirely by a man who is both Fascist and Communist. General Giraud intervened and said that he was surprised to learn that President Roosevelt should be described as determining the foreign policies of the State Department. He had always thought that the President and the Department had separate foreign policies, which fact he regarded as an outstanding example of that marvelous principle of "division of powers" which is so well defined in one of the basic charters of American democracy, probably the Gettysburg Address.

Mr. Arthur Krock was then cited by M. Philip as his source of information regarding the determination of State Department policies by President Roosevelt. M. Massigli asked whether the committee should not issue a statement that it looked upon such a situation as denoting "personal ambitions" on the part of President Roosevelt and refuse recognition on these grounds. General Giraud, speaking about Mr. Krock, who had been mentioned by M. Philip, proposed that his name should be acclaimed by the committee, together with those of Messrs. Harold Callender and Ernest K. Lindley, as those of three sincere friends of France and Franco-American collaboration. General de Gaulle said that he would have to think this over and suggested that the matter be discussed again at the next meeting.

General Giraud expressed regrets that such an important question should not be discussed immediately and said that he could categorically refute the accusation leveled against President Roosevelt that he pursued his personal policies in foreign political matters, because, as far at least as French matters were concerned, he was certain that the President listened to the advice of Admiral Leahy, a friend of France and a close friend of Marshal Pétain and of Harry Hopkins, a much-traveled gentleman. For all these reasons it was unjust to accuse

President Roosevelt of "dictatorial tendencies" and to refuse the recognition of his State Department on these grounds. He added that he knew for certain that wherever President Roosevelt went he left a "trail of Francophilia" behind him. As a source for this information, he quoted a confidential report by Mr. Churchill given to him for his exclusive personal use.

General de Gaulle then summed up the debate, saying that though he was not in favor of a "full" recognition, nor of a "provisional" recognition, nor of a "de facto" recognition, he would take into consideration a fourth category: recognition as an "ally," for which there was some precedent during the Thirty Years' War, which he promised to submit to the next meeting. He said that he would propose this recognition merely in consideration of the fact that General Eisenhower was being maintained as chief of the American army in Europe, but he still did not like the idea that President Roosevelt as commander-in-chief of the American army should unite in his hands both military and political powers.

BY ARGUS

ONE of Germany's troubles is its young people. There are fanatical believers in Nazism among them, but there are also those who oppose it. Professor von Gruneberg, a hundred-per-cent Nazi, seems to think the latter predominate. In an article in the Preussische Zeitung of July 20 he complained that youth shows an alarming "indifference." Over and over again he tolled the bell on this note:

> The younger generation lacks the balance of the older people, who know that the years since 1933 have been their salvation. Therefore, young people are necessarily quite indifferent to both the great successes and the present critical hours of the war. The rapid succession of important events in their early youth has made them less susceptible to enthusiasm.

But the Nazi professor is not always so circumlocutory. Of the university students he says bluntly, "They are tired of the political conception of life and are seeking private intellectual satisfaction." He confesses that it makes him "shudder to think that they will some day hold responsible positions in German society."

The scarcity of manufactured goods is illustrated every day by new examples.

On July 27 in Flensburg, a town near the Danish border, every household which rented an electric oven from the electric company was ordered to turn it in. A proclamation by the mayor said the ovens were to be given up without delay because they were "needed immediately" (possibly in the near-by city of Hamburg).

On July 31 the official news agency, DNB, released this announcement:

> The Reich Health Leader has issued an order that all members of the medical profession, especially doctors and dentists using X-ray equipment, must register their equipment with the Reich Defense Commissary.

Such registration is always followed by requisitioning.

On August 1 and 2 the Berlin correspondent of the Swedish newspaper, Social-Demokraten, announced that ration cards for textile products of all kinds had been annulled throughout Germany. This was done in order to reserve all supplies on hand for air-raid victims who have lost everything. Dresses, trousers, underwear, hats, sheets, etc., can no longer be bought in Germany. Exceptions are made—aside from air-raid victims—only for children and expectant mothers. Sentiment, however, is not forgotten. Relatives of those who have died in air raids and in battle are permitted to buy mourning.

A leaflet, of which thousands of copies were distributed in Berlin after the fall of Mussolini, has already been mentioned in dispatches to the American press. The Berlin correspondent of the Stockholm Aftontidningen reported on August 3 that the Gestapo was feverishly but unsuccessfully trying to track down the producers and distributors of the leaflet. The text, as published in Aftontidningen, is as follows:

> IMAGINE THIS!
> Goebbels's radio and press minimize the revolutionary events in Italy. They say that it is only a change of government, that it is entirely an internal Italian matter, and that the war will continue. We can, however, get a clearer insight into the events and be better able to grasp what happened if we try to project them on to the background of German conditions.
> Imagine workers in Berlin, Hamburg, and all other major cities of the Reich stopping work, filling the streets, and shouting, "We want peace!" Imagine Hitler trying to avoid catastrophe by resigning his post and withdrawing to Berchtesgaden. Imagine officers and soldiers declaring their solidarity with rebellious workers, all the offices of the party and of party officials closing down, and the extirpation of Nazism. Imagine Göring, Himmler, Goebbels, and all the others arrested and locked up, and excited masses breaking into the houses and palaces of the Nazi dogs and distributing their hoarded food stuffs among the people. Imagine the editor in chief of the Völkischer Beobachter arrested and the newspaper suddenly appearing as a democratic organ. Imagine hundreds and thousands of people asking the Gestapo to release prisoners, imagine this demand fulfilled and the members of the Gestapo taken to concentration camps.
> Imagine all this, and you will know what really happened in Italy.

RICHARD EBERHART

Mr. Moult's "Majority"

THE BEST POEMS OF 1942. Selected by Thomas Moult. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

MR. MOULT, in an introduction that celebrates the twenty-first year of this annual series, declares that, in spite of criticism, he persists in the adjective "best." An editor, he says, must have the courage of his convictions. So far so good; and, of course, every man to his taste. Every man to his taste; but to exploit and advertise a certain kind of taste over two full decades may be not so much courageous as plain foolhardy. For the effort is nonsensical if the reader lacks confidence in the editor's judgment; this failing, neither years nor poets can be properly esteemed. It is pertinent, therefore, to subject Mr. Moult's competence to a little further inquiry.

The authors of what Mr. Moult claims to be the best poems of 1942 are approximately sixty in number, divided about evenly between British and Americans, with a sprinkling of Canadians and Irish. There are no South Africans, Australians, or New Zealanders. The best known English names are those of De la Mare, Masefield, Blunden, Shanks, Gogarty, and Spender. (The poems of the last two, by the way, appeared in American periodicals). The best known American names are those of David Morton, who appears three times, more than any other poet in the book, Babette Deutsch, Conrad Aiken, Richard Eberhart, and Oscar Williams. At the same time, there are a lot of poets like Joseph Auslander, Tom Boggs, Stanton A. Coblentz, Anderson M. Scruggs, and Harold Vinal. Not only a lot of poets like these, but also their very selves, in person.

On the other hand, T. S. Eliot, apparently, did not write one of the best poems of 1942. When were "East Coker" and "The Dry Salvages" first published? Neither did W. H. Auden have any such luck, nor George Barker, Louis MacNeice, W. R. Rodgers (whose book is advertised by the publishers on the reverse jacket), nor Dylan Thomas. Neither, in Canada, did Raymond Knister, A. M. Klein, nor A. J. M. Smith.

On our side of the border, it is easy to think of many others. Neither of the Benéts appears, nor does Frost, nor Sandburg, nor MacLeish. John Crowe Ransom is not here, nor is Allen Tate, nor R. P. Blackmur, nor R. P. Warren, nor Yvor Winters. Karl Shapiro is not here, nor is any of the four poets who were this year awarded Guggenheim fellowships. Neither is Randall Jarrell, nor Horace Gregory (both on the Harcourt list). Neither is Kenneth Fearing, nor Langston Hughes. Neither is Theodore Roethke, nor W. T. Scott. Neither is William Carlos Williams; neither is Marya Zaturenska. You will probably think of others, gentle readers. Is not all this something of a shock? And is not my list long enough to demonstrate that I am not merely caviling at the absence of my personal favorites?

Let us next consider the places where Mr. Moult has found the best poems. Most of the English poems are taken from London publications: Mr. Moult's favorite, by long odds, is a magazine called the Listener, from which he has taken nine poems, more than twice as many as he has culled from any other single area. The London publications include the Sunday Times, Adelphi, English, the Observer, the New Statesman and Nation, Poetry Review, the New English Weekly, Horizon, Time and Tide, and the Nineteenth Century and After (though not much after, I would risk a small bet). The Queen's Quarterly, in Toronto, has yielded two specimens, one the longest in the book; the Canadian Quarterly another. The Dublin Magazine is the source of two poems, and Jongleur, published in Bradford, Yorkshire, yields one.

Whereas in England Mr. Moult seems, in his eclecticism, inclined to be a townee, his American impulses are much more provincial. The Lyric (Norfolk, Virginia), Wings (Mill Valley, California), Poetry Forum (Baltimore), Fantasy (Pittsburgh), talaria (Cincinnati), Prairie Schooner (Lincoln, Nebraska), Contemporary Poetry (Baltimore again), the Tramp (Anacortes, Washington), Kaleidograph (Dallas)—these testify to his range. How he managed to miss something called the American Weave is a mystery to me. He could hardly have missed Poetry (Chicago), or the Atlantic Monthly (Boston), though in each instance he came mighty close, taking one poem from each. He also got in something from the Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), and the Virginia Quarterly Review (Charlottesville). He did not find very much in New York: four items from Voices, his American favorite; two from Spirit, one each from the New York Times, the Saturday Review of Literature, Decision, and Common Sense. The Nation had a narrow escape, just getting under the wire with the last poem in the book, One Morning the World Woke Up, by Oscar Williams.

Mr. Moult found nothing to qualify in the pages of Harper's or the American Mercury; nothing in the New Masses, the New Republic, the New Yorker; nothing in the Kenyon Review, the Southern Review, the Southwestern Review, the Yale Review, or Partisan Review. He did not discover, in his continental roamings, either the poetry column conducted by W. T. Scott in the Providence Journal (which paid poets, by the way), or the extensive department of poetry edited by Alan Swallow in the New Mexico Quarterly. Perhaps this would be asking too much; but if a man can find talaria, and the Tramp, wouldn't you think—?

Now let us have a look at the best poems themselves, remembering that those published in 1942 were written some time earlier. You would have a hard time proving, from these pages, that there was a war on; the event is mentioned, described, or alluded to, in less than a dozen items. That the war neither scares nor interests poets might be a healthy sign; as it is surely one that neither the official line nor private bloodthirstiness do any loud shrieking in these pages. On the other hand, the trouble is, these writers seem to have no strong feelings, either for, against, or about the whole bloody business: Oscar Williams's poem, Stephen Spender's phrase, "where everything stops but the wishes that kill," and the sensitive remarks of David Morton in the sonnet entitled Lost Lexicon are exceptions to the general rule. For the most part, the treatment is casual or conventional: the familiar, the inevitable airplane-and-bomb make their appearance, of course. The men of the infantry and artillery are going to get little notice from literature this time, it seems.

If not the war in particular, do the anxieties, fears, doubts, confusions of our times in general, then, reveal themselves in the work of these writers? Oh, not at all; they are a most untroubled lot. What do they write about? They write about stars in their steadfast course in heaven; about horses ploughing fields; about hawks in the height of air, and other birds, preferably curlews, hovering around hedgerows; about quaint old people inhabiting houses; about harebells and all-heal; about beauty being memorable; about young girls sleeping, and the foam of dreams. In short, the best poems of 1942 might just as well be those of 1912, and who would be any the wiser? It is not a question of the subjects mentioned above being the timeless stuff of poetry, either; what counts is the insight with which they are seen, the emotion with which they are felt, the skill with which that emotion is communicated, the vigor and freshness with which their tradition is maintained, the music with which they are made anew. No, what we have here is not timelessness, but stick-in-the-mud Georgianism; and it is for this sort of thing that Mr. Moult's taste yearns. It is this sort of thing he has an infallible ability to discover, whether it has to be fished up from some curious little back-eddy in the heart of London, or from the shallow ponds of the American provinces.

No, Mr. Moult, no, no. Nobody, save yourself and a few, perhaps, of your less sophisticated contributors will believe, really, that these are the best poems of 1942. I am sure better poems were written, and published, in 1942 than most of these, and—let us be fair—so, no doubt, were many that were worse. And my own hunch is that during the forties better poems were and are being written than were and are being published, and that these will, eventually, come to light, though it may not be till some time after the duration.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Falange—An Axis Tool

FALANGE: THE AXIS SECRET ARMY IN THE AMERICAS. By Allan Chase. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

I SUPPOSE it was inevitable that the publishers of Allan Chase's "Falange" should stress the more sensational charges of this extraordinarily well documented study of Spanish fascism and the way it has served the Axis in its fight against the democracies. On the front of the book's jacket is the challenging statement that it presents "proof that over a million trained enemies of the United States are now actively engaged in undercover warfare in both North and South America." And on the back are twenty provocative questions, the answers to which, within the book itself, leave no doubt as to the role that Germany is playing in using the Falange as a powerful weapon against us.

And yet, detailed as are Mr. Chase's proofs of spying, sabotage, and anti-democratic propaganda in the Philippines, Latin America, and the United States itself, his story of the willingness of thousands of reactionaries everywhere to sacrifice the interests of their own country or people to their personal advantage or class loyalty is infinitely more sickening.

The importance of Mr. Chase's story lies not so much in why the Philippine Falange was decorated by Japan after the fall of Manila or who took photos of American naval bases in Panama and sent them to Germany as in the record of the complacency with which our diplomatic representatives abroad viewed the traitorous activities of those who financed and led the Falange.

In the Philippines it was the old Spanish aristocracy that stood back of it. "Sons of wealthy Spanish planters and colonial traders," says Mr. Chase, "they had, as boys or youths, emotionally or physically fought to keep the archipelago within the Spanish empire during the Spanish-American War. Trained from childhood to hate the freedom of peoples, the freedom of religions, and the freedom of education, they had within their own lifetime seen all three freedoms develop in the Philippines."

And they didn't like it. It was understandable enough that containing the best and latest work of the important American and English poets, as well as the work of a number of new and exciting talents. As in the past, the 1943 book contains a section devoted to photographs of the contributors. Also many poems by such poets as Wallace Stevens, E. E. Cummings, etc., are here printed for the first time, making the book a fine 1st edition item. That Mr. Williams is an able editor with a high standard has been proven by the acclaim of leading critics for his last two collections in this series. The previous anthologies were listed by The Nation among the "notable books" for 1941 and 1942. The present volume, the best of the three, is a "must" for every lover of modern poetry.

they should not, if you know anything about the education of an upper-class Spaniard. It was logical, too, that they were eager to support a fascist revolution in a republican Spain where their investments were threatened and their profits curtailed. That they understood the nature of fascism far better than our diplomats abroad was clearly shown by their eagerness to keep up the work of the Falange even after the Spanish Republic had been destroyed. What is not so easily understood is why we stood by and permitted them to build their Falange without let or hindrance.

In the Philippines, Mr. Chase reveals, it was the Falange which sabotaged civilian defense. In Puerto Rico, our Gibraltar of the Caribbean, he adds, "the Falange and its most important supporters appear in high places."

The story of the Falange in the United States is too familiar to need repeating. The tragedy was that so many Americans allowed their economic or religious loyalties to blind them to the threat that Spanish fascism held for America. Many among them today must squirm at the memory of how they were duped by such Franco apologists as Jane Anderson, once described by Monsignor Fulton Sheen of the Catholic University as "one of the martyrs" of history and today under indictment for treason as Berlin's "Lady Haw Haw."

The post-Spanish-civil-war Falange presents a problem that is peculiarly American. It has flourished in those countries where Spanish colonial influence was once dominant, countries which, in one way or another, touch us closely. Mr. Chase's charges therefore cannot be ignored. Basing his demand on Mr. Chase's book, Representative John Coffee has asked for a Congressional investigation of the Spanish Falange. It would be incredible if such an investigation should be refused by a Congress that has voted hundreds of thousands of dollars to finance the antics of Representative Dies.

Mr. Chase has an annoying habit of dramatizing events and conversations in a manner that strains credibility a little, but he can be forgiven this fault for his magnificent last chapter, which tears to pieces the miserable policy the United States has followed in Spain since the outbreak of the revolution in 1936. It is a curious fact that, though more than one high official in Washington will tell you that our refusal to sell arms to Republican Spain for fear of offending Hitler and Mussolini was a horrible blunder, still they do nothing to correct that blunder. Even today we continue to appease Franco, and Mr. Chase's wrath is a pleasure to anyone who saw the stricken look that came into the eyes of Spanish Republicans in Madrid when they knew, finally, that we had betrayed them.

His conclusion, therefore, is too sound to be missed:

> If it was dangerous to appease fascism in 1936, it is a thousand times more perilous today. For the fascist cancer has more than merely brought death to Spain itself; it has, in the form of Falangismo, spread to Manila, to Latin America, to the United States of America. Spain has become the base headquarters of the greatest Axis fifth column in the Western Hemisphere, a fifth column that will not be smashed until fascism is destroyed on the entire Iberian peninsula.

The Making of a State

MASARYK IN ENGLAND. By R. W. Seton-Watson. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

SINCE the time of Protagoras, whose dictum, "Man is the measure," laid the foundation of humanism, there have been but few great Western philosophers, like Erasmus of Rotterdam or Janus Comenius, like John Locke or Tom Paine, whose political doctrine centered upon the humanistic ideal. Still fewer the statesmen whose policies were rooted in humanism rather than in religious or nationalistic ideas. Thomas G. Masaryk was incontestably an outstanding representative of both types. Unfortunately he stood almost alone in the nationalistic wilderness of Europe between two world wars.

Professor Seton-Watson, Masaryk's friend for a quarter of a century and, with Wickham Steed, his sponsor in British political life, sums up a masterfully terse biographical sketch in the following sentence: "Masaryk was a great thinker . . . a great patriot to whom patriotism was never enough in itself, and to whom the brotherhood of man was a legacy from his own national past; a constructive statesman . . . also the most human of rulers, who radiated dignity and benevolence."

In the first half of his book the author gives a full account of Masaryk's activities in England from April, 1915, when he arrived in London, traveling as an exile on a Serbian passport and exciting the suspicion of the British police, until November, 1918, when the Grenadier Guards gave him as President-elect the royal salute at Victoria Station. It was six months before this arrival that the sixty-eight-year-old ex-professor of philosophy was leading the anabasis of 70,000 Czech and Slovak legionnaires via Siberia to Vladivostok. All this time London, the political center of the Allies, was Masaryk's headquarters. Although it was due to his direct and indirect influence at the White House that "the Dual Monarchy crumbled before the impact of Wilsonian diplomacy," yet Britain was first to recognize Czechoslovakia as an Allied and belligerent nation. This dénouement was the result of Masaryk's manifold relentless agility, into which his letters to the author, first published in this volume, supply an interesting insight. Chapter III contains Masaryk's confidential memorandum on Bohemia to the Foreign Office, also hitherto unpublished.

While Masaryk was writing memoranda, contributing to the magazine New Europe, on the publication of which he insisted, and lecturing to the School of Slavonic Studies, his devoted follower, Dr. Benes, then in Paris, efficiently collaborated. Haters of democracy have developed a Czechophobia which leads them to contrast Masaryk, the "philosopher king," with Benes, who is portrayed as an incurable imperialist. Professor Seton-Watson aptly insists therefore "upon the absolute harmony of views, alike in the theory and the practice of foreign policy, between the two men." Benes's unique position for twenty years "was due in the first instance to Masaryk's resolute support against every intrigue."

"Masaryk in England" presents but a short chapter in the president-liberator's rich and eventful life, but certainly a significant one. President Benes is facing now a situation similar to that which confronted Masaryk after recognition by the Allies. His case is being supported, however, by a new and strong argument: twenty years of Czechoslovak history have borne witness to the true democratic and social spirit of the republic. However, the weight and moment of this argument largely depend on the ability of the victorious statesmen to share Masaryk's belief that "Jesus, not Caesar, is the meaning of history." Concerning the Peace

TOWARDS AN ABIDING PEACE. By R. M. MacIver. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN THIS summer of 1943, when post-war planning has become the daily fare of ad writers and platform speakers, a new book about peace finds the reviewer weary and suspicious. But "Towards an Abiding Peace" is not just another peace book. Far from it: it is probably the best book of this kind that has appeared in years. Dr. MacIver, who is neither a wild-eyed dreamer nor a self-styled expert—he is a Columbia University sociologist—goes at his subject with the wisdom of a trained social scientist and the fervor of an out-and-out democrat. In noble and hard-hitting prose, he tells us what peace is and how we can get it. With inescapable logic, peace is shown to depend upon international law, international law upon international police, and international police upon national disarmament. "So long as any state owns for its exclusive purposes a single cruiser or a single battery of heavy guns, the establishment of international law is still unattained."

Peace, then, means above all the gradual reduction of national armament. It means also, according to Dr. MacIver's persuasive analysis, the internationalization of colonies and strategic waterways, the quick readoption of defeated enemy countries into the family of nations, and the abandonment of the idea of independent national sovereignty. It means many other important and intelligent things that fill this short volume to the brim and make it something like a compendium of liberal post-war thinking. Between the two emerging schools of thought—political versus economic, international versus domestic, global versus regional solutions—Dr. MacIver takes a stand for political internationalism and makes an excellent case for it. Also, having the advantage of being late in the game, he can answer other writers before him: he has disapproval for Adamic, admiration for Ferrero, doubts about Carr, and a smile for Culbertson. To writers like Walter Lippmann he has this to say: "It should be the special role of America to make certain that calculations of future strategy . . . shall be banned from the next peace table."

In short, the book is proof that the problem of lasting peace is not necessarily an assignment for cranks. But does that mean that abiding peace is "a quite attainable goal," as the blurb assures us? Dr. MacIver insists that his ideas are not utopian but practical. But he himself says that "the genuine business" of the statesman and the economist is not with such questions as how private enterprise can be saved or how socialism can be achieved. It is rather with questions of this kind: "How can economic opportunity be more widely and more equally distributed? How can unemployment be avoided and at what cost? How can a minimum standard of economic welfare be assured to all? How can the disastrous cycle of economic advance and retreat be mitigated and controlled? How can the remarkable advances of technology be translated into greater general prosperity?" Very good. But, by the same token, is the question how world peace can be attained "the genuine business" of a statesman? Isn't this, too, one of the wrong questions to ask? Isn't it true, in politics also, that the great ideals are achieved by way of humble devotion to specific tasks? Maybe Dr. MacIver shouldn't have wasted his time and scientific training in writing this admirable book. RUDOLF FLESCH

Shakespeare's Text

THE EDITORIAL PROBLEM IN SHAKESPEARE: A SURVEY OF THE FOUNDATIONS OF THE TEXT. By W. W. Greg. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

SINCE 1900 a revolution has been effected in most departments of our knowledge of Shakespeare's work, but nowhere has it been more startling and decisive than in the traditional views of his text. When certain English scholars —A. W. Pollard, E. K. Chambers, R. B. McKerrow, W. W. Greg—began work about forty years ago, textual study appeared to have reached a dead end. It was thought that the great Cambridge edition of 1863-66 had done as much as was possible to recover what Shakespeare wrote from the early texts of his plays, so depraved and so far removed from his originals; lucky emendation might clear up for us a few more passages, but the damage on the whole had been done too long ago, the originals had disappeared, and the corruption was irreparable. Into this gloom came men with new methods, the methods of what is called critical bibliography. The Quarto editions of plays published during Shakespeare's lifetime, long depreciated, were classified into "good" and "bad" groups, and most of the "good" ones, as well as the eighteen plays first printed in the Folio of 1623, were shown to rest on authority—on autograph manuscripts or on prompt-copies from the company for which he wrote. Untiring research accumulated knowledge concerning theatrical conditions, manuscripts, companies, methods of abridging and "reporting" plays, publishers, the printing house, the descent of editions, Elizabethan spelling and punctuation, Elizabethan handwriting. An addition in the manuscript play "Sir Thomas More," in the British Museum, has even been proved—one can now say—to be in Shakespeare's hand. The essential integrity of his text has been vindicated. An editor's judgment must be based henceforward on a decision as to the nature of the copy which was used for the Quarto and Folio texts before him; since materials for a decision are available, despair has given way to a spirit of "restrained optimism." The importance of this knowledge to the reader of Shakespeare will be clear when he is told, for instance, that his copy of "King Lear" is riddled with readings from the inferior Quarto of 1608 and even from the worthless reprint of 1619, some four-fifths of which are almost certainly wrong. In nearly all modern editions, critical and casual, a single passage of nine lines (1:1, 151-9) contains five or six or seven of which perhaps one is justified.

To all this work Dr. Greg has contributed heavily, and his Clark Lectures of 1939, here printed with documentation and commentary, form the best record of its results that has appeared. Indeed, a more authoritative exposition is inconceivable. If it can be proper to discriminate between the general attitudes of scholars and bibliographers, all so cautious, and if a political analogy is permissible, the pioneers might be ranged as follows: McKerrow, Royalist; Chambers, right center; Pollard, left center (were Dover Wilson admitted to this rare company he would stand still further to the left). Greg stands, I believe, directly in the center. His scholarship for forty years has been as ambitious and original as it has been careful, and his accuracy is proverbial among Shakespearean students. This book would be indispensable if it merely assembled his main conclusions from his other books and essays. But it displays some of them as altered; the whole problem of editorial decision is studied at length; the principal work of his colleagues is passed in scrupulous review; much new evidence is presented; and stage directions especially are pressed everywhere for their last suggestiveness—at this sort of analysis it is doubtful whether Greg has a peer even in Chambers. One instance of altered opinion is characteristic. In 1910 he brought forward an explanation of the "bad" Quarto of "The Merry Wives of Windsor": "Greg has shown," I quote from Chambers's standard "William Shakespeare" (1930), "that in 'Merry Wives' the reporter was almost certainly an actor who played the Host, and reconstructed the play from memory." This view has hardly been challenged, and it has been very influential in studies of the other "bad" Quartos. Greg, however, a man difficult to satisfy, now says, "I formerly suggested that the report was made by the actor of this part. It may be so, but there are difficulties"; and after packing the difficulties into a sentence, "Perhaps it would be safer to assume an independent reporter relying generally on mine Host's assistance." In the substantial agreement of Greg and Chambers, by the way, where they have handled the same subject, can be found a handsome index to the reliability of modern textual scholarship.

The fifty pages of Prolegomena to this volume, On Editing Shakespeare, can scarcely be discussed here, but I may record my opinion that, of proposals at all similar which I have read (all, I think, now generally held to have significance beyond their immediate objects), none will sustain comparison, for justice and fulness, with these. Although they are offered by Greg as an "interpretation and development" of McKerrow's "Prolegomena for the Oxford Shakespeare" (published in 1939 shortly before his death), and are phrased throughout with Greg's habitual modesty, they in fact correct the rigidly conservative proposals of McKerrow in very important respects, amplify them in others, and break new ground at half a dozen points. Greg's experience and insight have never been better employed. The certainty that no critical edition of Shakespeare can be undertaken in the future without reference to these Prolegomena sharpens one's regret that Dr. Greg has not himself been given an opportunity to edit the plays; perhaps no one else, in the long history of Shakespearean study, has been so well equipped. We might have got that phoenix, a sound and standard text.

Fiction in Review

ALTHOUGH John P. Marquand's "So Little Time" (Little, Brown, $2.75) is his best novel to date and the most interesting coming-of-the-war novel I have read, there is a disconcerting discrepancy between the quality of its first two-thirds and its last third. It is not only that the last 200 pages are tedious in themselves; they cast a dark shadow over the freshness and charm of the 400 pages that precede them, making it difficult to recapture the original glow.

For instance, if I had written this review before I had to take into account the effect of Mr. Marquand's book as a whole, I should have liked to use its simplicity and relaxation and visuality as an object lesson for all earnest young writers who think of fiction as a form of intellectual exhibitionism; certainly it is not the conscious intellect but creative energy that writes a novel, and for a good stretch of the way "So Little Time" is a fine lesson in naturalness. But then Mr. Marquand spoils my case for me; or rather, he puts me in the unhappy position of having to switch from my author-as-model to my author-as-bad-example. For in the last 200 pages, when creative energy fails Mr. Marquand and nothing is left but a mind at work, one could indeed wish that his thought processes were more stimulating. Or I should have liked to say of "So Little Time," before I had gone its full length, that here was fiction which, in contrast to the over-formulation of so many current novels, effectively makes its point by simply never making its point—were it not that the tediousness of the last section of Mr. Marquand's book must surely result in large part from his effort to point up the meaning of a novel whose meaning was never particularly in question until he undertook the job of clarification.

In the sense in which "The Late George Apley" was a novel "about" Boston, "So Little Time" is not a novel about anything. Very loosely constructed and ranging over twenty-five years of time, it is the emotional history of a man who fought in the last war and who has a son just the right age to fight in this war. Mr. Marquand's hero, middle-aged in 1940-41, wants to know what his life adds up to in the light of the fact that his son is about to have to fight—this is the serious point of departure for Mr. Marquand's novel, but actually what makes the story interesting is Jeff Wilson's success as a play-doctor and movie-writer and his position in society, which allows Mr. Marquand to roam, with the freedom that only money can buy, over such a wonderful variety of places, from theater rehearsals to Park Avenue apartments, from Massachusetts to Hollywood to Washington to suburban Connecticut, exhibiting to excellent advantage his limited but very shrewd talents for observation and satire. The important relations between characters in "So Little Time" may always be a matter of confusion and one may be forced to conclude that its author is novelistically comfortable only with what has actually met his eye, but Mr. Marquand's novel is full of wonderful satiric set pieces, including people, such as the description of the Connecticut home of a young middle-aged couple who live on tax-exempt bonds, or the description of lunch at an exclusive club, or the description of a publisher's cocktail party, or Mr. Marquand's own clean version of a Hollywood script conference. And there is an account of the changes that the years have brought to the Boston Post Road which is better than the best of Mr. Marquand's satire, as well as one scene, at a private riding lesson, which rises so far above his usual level of vision as to achieve something reminiscent of greatness.

Of course, even so early in the game Mr. Marquand is not the first novelist to use the outbreak of the war as the precipitating or resolving agent for the casting up of an individual's score. But at least one thing that distinguishes "So Little Time" from a novel like, say, Michael Blankfort's "A Time to Live" is its refusal to treat a world-wide catastrophe as if it had been especially devised to accomplish the author's personal salvation—and all on the highest moral and intellectual grounds. I find it a crude relief that Mr. Marquand's hero, veteran of the last war, hates the idea of a new war because he loves his son and fears for his safety but still can envy the boy the adventure of war and himself wish to enlist again for no higher reason than that it might help him recapture his lost youth. "So Little Time" obviously misses the stature of tragedy because its chief characters lack stature, and yet, if only because it stays with the individual in his full commonplaceness and without the trappings of cosmic virtue, it achieves some small measure of tragic import. And paradoxically, despite its limitations, it becomes a valid social document exactly because it is not intended to be a social document.

I may be mistaken in thinking that "A Man of Malice Landing" by Dorothy James Roberts (Macmillan, $2.50), being written by a woman, should have had a woman for its protagonist. It is not that I think women novelists incapable of creating male heroes. But I was constantly struck, in Miss Roberts's account of the education of Marius Robinson and especially in the major sections which deal with Marius's return to Malice Landing (Ohio), by how much more accurately it seemed to trace the emotional pattern of a certain kind of self-conscious, "sensitive" woman than that of her male counterpart. Miss Roberts writes with taste, education, and directness, and she has a nice point of departure for a novel—not that I put much stock in points of departure for novels—in the notion of a man who leaves his small town to make his way in the big city and then, when he returns, discovers that any cross-roads may be the world but that his own small town is too small a world and that he still prefers the big city. It is a nice double turn on the current sentimentality about life and freedom and self-fulfilment being all a matter of discovering the gold in the heart of your rural neighbors. Still, I prefer fiction which projects itself either through bigger people than Marius Robinson or over a more complex canvas than Miss Roberts has attempted.

MUSIC

TOSCANINI'S July broadcast of another Verdi program offered a number of familiar pieces—O don fatale from "Don Carlos," Pace, pace, mio dio from "La Forza del Destino," Eri tu from "Un Ballo in Maschera," the entire last act of "Rigoletto" with its famous quartet—in performances which molded and integrated vocal line and orchestral context in a style that made their dramatic expressiveness and power breath-taking. These performances made it especially fascinating to follow the course of each piece—the powerful introductory passage and accompaniment figure of the orchestra, the beautiful and expressive melodic line of the voice, the single woodwind joining the voice at a salient point in this line, the other wind instruments entering to create a texture around the voice in its further progress (these instrumental counterpoints were things one heard in the studio but not over the air, where microphone placement caused them to be blanketed by the voices). Following in this way one was aware of magnificent pieces of dramatic music taking shape in those arias, that final act, that quartet; and one marveled again and again at the evidence of Verdi's feeling for his medium, his skill and taste in its use, in the service of the dramatic situation.

Of the singers two were already well known—Jan Peerce, who has a beautiful tenor voice, and whose authenticity of style includes the tenor sob; and the young baritone Alfredo Valentino, whose singing has a fine sonority and authority. And two were young newcomers—Ann Merriman, with a superb contralto voice which she has under technical control and employs with good musical understanding; and Gertrude Ribla, with a beautiful soprano which—to judge from occasional unsteadiness and tremolo and stridency—she uses with imperfect and insecure method of production, and which she will harm if she continues to sing without learning how.

Webster Aitken's performance of Beethoven's Diabelli Variations at a Frick Collection summer concert proved to be one of the great events of the year. The performance at his debut about seven years ago left one astonished by the manifestations of maturity in the playing of so young a man; but this time one was even more astonished by the evidence of greater maturity of understanding and emotion in a performance at once more expansive and more integrated—by this in combination with the youthful verve that manifested itself right at the start in the rhythmic incisiveness, the buoyancy, the glints of humor in the statement of Diabelli's waltz. At a later Frick Collection concert the same expansive and integrating shaping produced a magnificently powerful statement of the first movement of Schubert's Sonata Op. 78; and while I do not share Aitken's conception of the subsequent movements—I feel them to be easy-going and relaxed, which he does not—I enjoyed the superb things he made of them in accordance with his own conception, especially the verve, the strength, the humor that he put into the last movement. At this second concert he also played a number of pieces by Debussy; and as one of those who used to think of Gieseking's miraculously achieved pastels as the last word in Debussy performance I was amazed again to hear how much more Aitken's imagination discovered in those pieces and conveyed through his more robust and rich-sounding sonorities. And these were pieces and performances which demonstrated his superb mastery of his instrument. As our musical life is organized his playing may be heard by a handful of people at the Frick Collection, but it is nevertheless among the greatest there is to be heard.

Victor has issued a set (943, $5.50) of D'Indy's Symphony No. 2 in B flat Op. 57, performed by Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony; and Victor's press division has been kind enough to send with it the set (913, $3.50) of D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air Op. 25, performed by Monteux with the same orchestra and the pianist Maxim Schapiro, which failed to reach me when it was issued about a year ago.

The Symphony No. 2 begins with germinal motifs, out of which come the themes of the movements; and cyclical unity is achieved further by the recurrence in later movements of themes from earlier movements. But from the first germinal motif to the last grand combination of themes it is an arbitrary, mechanical progression unmotivated and unmitigated by a grain of genuine poetic impulse or creative talent, producing in the end a mere illustration for D'Indy's "Cours de Composition Musicale" and one of the dullest, dreariest, and most unattractive pieces of music I have ever heard. The performance seems good; its recorded sound is excellent; surfaces range from fair to poor.

The earlier symphony has the advantage of being made out of the French mountain air and other tuneful themes which work out less elaborately into a more engaging work—though it is not one that I care much about. The performance seems good; its recorded sound is excellent; surfaces range from fair to poor; and a few sides of my copy waver in pitch. B. H. HAGGIN

Why the Secrecy?

Dear Sirs: May I suggest that your magazine criticize the secrecy and lack of democracy with which our government is handling the Italian affair?

Must Americans hear, via the German radio, the terms offered to Italy through a puppet ruler disguised as the people's choice, when actually he is as much a Fascist as Mussolini? (What went wrong with that coup d'état anyway? It didn't pan out the way it was intended.) America's honor is at stake. It can be redeemed, if we offer to negotiate openly and honestly with a chosen representative of the Italian people on the basis of the Atlantic Charter.

The Italian people do not relish another dictatorship backed by our Gauleiters. They want an opportunity to choose their own government, and if we as a nation act nobly and generously with these people we can expect an early peace in Europe. Other people will be impressed by our fairness, and they will force their dictators to abdicate so that they too can have an honorable peace.

Can it be we have lost sight of our objective, as is so often the case when nations become drunk with power? Peace and a return to civilization should be our only aims. We do not wish to rule, and we did not accept the war on those terms.

All eyes are upon us now. We cannot afford to go back on our promise.

What Soldiers Think About

Dear Sirs: I read with interest the letter of Ellsworth Barnard, in your issue of July 3, on the subject of history—and education in general—in our high schools. To my mind most of his contentions are definitely valid, and his letter is all the more important because it touches the root of the entire matter.

However, I was particularly interested in one aspect of his presentation, namely, his account of Drew Middleton's report in the Times Magazine. Although I did not read the full report, the small part of it which I did read (in Mr. Barnard's letter) echoed some of my own observations and opinions, gathered in my year of service in the United States Army. Mr. Middleton is one of the very few commentators or correspondents from whom I have heard any comment upon this question. Vague antipathy, vague benevolence, indeed! Vagueness, in fact, sums up the entire attitude of the large majority of our soldiers of democracy. Hardly a thought, or at least no expression of that thought if such exists, is given to any sort of political or social problem that the world faces—and that includes our own country.

Where such expression does come to the fore, it usually displays prejudice, ignorance of facts (with very blasé, impersonal overtones), cynicism, smugness, and an utter lack of understanding as to the basic issues of the war. Post-war peace conferences, post-war planning, reconstruction, adjustment to an America that will not be as they left it—these and other equally important questions are rarely subject matter for an evening's discussion. Opinions (prejudices, more accurately) do exist, to be sure.

Common among them are: "Watch out for Russia after this war." "Beat the Japs first and then forget about the other side, since Britain would do the same." "Our kids will have to fight another war in twenty or so years, so what does it matter?" "This war will end when the big shots have made enough money on both sides." "If we had kept our noses clean we wouldn't have been in this in the first place." Etc., etc., ad infinitum, ad nauseam. Any thirst for discussion is fulfilled by long, pornographic "bull sessions," devoted chiefly to sexual matters, merits and effects of one type of inebriation as compared to another, and other intellectual food on a similar plane. Middleton very succinctly summed up the "intellectual curiosity" of our soldiers with regard to the comic strip and sports pages. In our barracks, which has quite a fair-sized number of men, I know of but one interested enough in political and social matters to read anything more progressive or politically mature than Life magazine, a sad commentary on the state of mind of the men fighting to build a better world.

It is very distressing, to say the least, that of our hundreds of war correspondents, news commentators, and reporters, only a handful have seen fit to comment upon this unfortunate situation, one with which most of them are surely acquainted. Perhaps it is better for civilian morale to leave such things unsaid, perhaps it is consciously blinding ourselves to a damnable situation, but surely this blot is of enough importance to warrant public discussion, the better to cope with the problem, the better to preclude its assertion in the future. Instead, our correspondents write of how Jim Smith of Main Street, Hicksville, Ohio, has conquered the water problem in his outfit (verily, a tribute to American ingenuity), or how John Doe has impressed the natives of Africa (a forward step, no doubt, in international relations). Yes, the folks at home want that stuff, but how about telling them some of the more important truths, even if it does hurt?

A noted American thinker and editor wrote, from London, that our troops were equipped with obsolete psychological equipment, particularly in comparison with that of some of our Allies. He stated it inaccurately. Our troops are equipped with no psychological equipment; only with a superficial understanding of the issues involved, expressed in "Let's get this damn thing over with so that we can go home and back to normal." Agreed, Mr. Barnard, "this is the result of our boasted system of education."

They Want Books

Dear Sirs: Out in the swirling sand storms, dust, and terrible heat of the Middle East, Sicily, and the Mediterranean coast, British soldiers and sailors, with our men and Canadian and Australian troops, are sweating and bleeding and dying that the cause of freedom may live. We here at home, many with our sons, husbands, brothers, sisters, and sweethearts in the armed forces, follow the struggle day by day, hour by hour, doing what we can to help in the battle for humanity. Either we are engaged in war work or we take a hand in civilian defense or in one of the agencies which give aid to our fighting men here and abroad. We buy bonds or grow victory gardens or help in other ways.

There is one important way, though, in which we can do our part to make life easier for the boys who are facing the enemy, and that is by sending them books and magazines. When these men have a few moments of rest and respite they want something to read. Thousands of books and magazines have already gone to them, but the need grows.

The British War Relief Society, a member agency in the National War Fund, is endeavoring to help meet this need. In the past it has confined its appeal to New York City, where the response has been so gratifying that the campaign is now being broadened to cover the whole nation.

The society forwards the books and, from the many appreciative responses already received, the Book Committee of the B. W. R. S. knows that they are read and read again until they are worn to tatters. Novels, detective and mystery stories, and romances are much in demand. Pocket-size books are particularly desirable.

We should be grateful if your readers would send books and magazines, quickly, to the nearest headquarters of the British War Relief Society. (Its New York address is 745 Fifth Avenue, fifth floor.) The sooner they are in our hands the sooner they will reach the men overseas.

Not Exempt

Dear Sirs: In the interesting, well-written article Advertise for Victory, which appeared some time ago in The Nation, there occurred the phrase ". . . since advertisements aiding the war-bond drive are tax-exempt." This statement is not literally correct.

The author doubtless meant that an expenditure made for such advertising is deductible as an expense under the income-tax law. However, even this version would not be correct as an invariable Treasury Department rule. In other words, there is extant no formal ruling by the Internal Revenue Bureau, as far as I know, differentiating war-bond advertising from all other advertising and giving it blanket tax deductibility.

OUR WAR OF NERVES AGAINST FIGHTING France continues unabated as this issue goes to press. With the inevitable gesture of recognition postponed week after week, indications leaked out to the press that when it does come it will be a wretched formula which in the end will do General De Gaulle more harm than good. Surprise is expressed in official quarters that anyone should expect recognition of the Committee of National Liberation to outlast by a minute the arrival of United Nations troops on continental French soil. That would be undemocratic, it is suggested, since the Committee has not received the mandate of the French people. At which point it is pertinent to inquire whether a military dictatorship under General Giraud would come closer to the expressed wishes of French voters—not to mention rule by Amgot in collaboration with Axis-sponsored leftovers from the Vichy regime. Both possibilities have figured in the spate of rumors that stream from Quebec. Some sort of recognition of the Committee by the time this issue reaches our readers is taken for granted. The acid test of our democratic intentions lies in the provision to be made for the Committee's status during the period following invasion and preceding a general election. The agency that governs the country during these politically fluid months will have a powerful voice in determining the fate of France. American permission to Alexander Bogomolov, Russian envoy to the free governments in London, to proceed at last to Algiers is a hopeful sign that we are being forced into a saner position with regard to the Committee. But the fact that this mission of an Allied diplomat was blocked for weeks by American intransigence is one more symptom of the pathological state of our diplomacy.

THE REVISED VERSION OF THE TREASURY'S plan for stabilizing world currencies is more satisfactory in many ways than the plan submitted last spring. It is still, however, definitely inferior to Lord Keynes's proposals for achieving the same objective. The new plan provides for more flexibility than the original one, particularly during the first three years of its existence. During this period the exchange rates of the various currencies can be adjusted by a majority vote of the managers of the International Stabilization Fund, provided the country whose currency is being adjusted agrees to the change. After the three-year period such a change would require a three-fourths majority. But since the United States has agreed that no one country shall have more than 20 per cent of the total votes, we no longer insist on having a veto power over such decisions. Changes in the gold value of the "unitas," the proposed unit of international currency, still cannot be made, however, without an 85-per-cent vote—which means without American consent. Moreover, the Treasury insists upon its own formula for voting power instead of accepting the more convenient British suggestion that participation be in direct ratio to the volume of a country's international trade. Another weakness of the Treasury's plan is its failure to provide for the active use of the world fund as a means of financing international reconstruction projects in countries devastated by the war. Finally, it continues to dodge the problem of discouraging the pursuit of those economic policies which frequently are the real cause of exchange disequilibrium. The most the managers of the fund will be able to do to a nation which persists in hoarding gold will be to shake a warning finger at it.

PRESUMABLY JOHN L. LEWIS REALLY HOPED to lead the United Mine Workers back into the American Federation of Labor and expected to receive a warm welcome; otherwise he would hardly have risked a rebuff. And, undoubtedly, many A. F. of L. chiefs were more than ready to kill the fatted calf for an organization which would contribute $90,000 in affiliation fees to the treasury. Even Daniel J. Tobin, the most influential friend of the New Deal in the Federation, had gone on record as approving readmission of the miners. But Lewis's arrogance defeated his own purpose. He tried to bully the executive council of the A. F. of L., insisting that his union was to be taken in "as is" and not "as was" at the time of its suspension eight years ago. Consequently he ran afoul of one of the most cherished articles in the Federation's constitution, which states: "No charter shall be granted . . . without a positive and clear definition of the jurisdiction claimed by the applicant, and the charter shall not be granted if the jurisdiction claimed is a trespass on the jurisdiction of existing affiliated unions without the written consent of such unions." Lewis, however, was not prepared to restrict his ubiquitous District 50, which he values highly as a means of raiding C. I. O. unions. On the other hand, the A. F. of L. could not afford to accept his proposal that this question be dealt with after the miners were back in the fold. That would have meant setting an awkward precedent in the event of later negotiations with C. I. O. unions. The upshot was an unmistakable rebuke to Lewis in the form of a reference of his application to the annual convention, without recommendation. In some quarters this decision is described as "a New Deal triumph." No doubt the New Dealers are pleased, but we suspect that Lewis has no one to thank but himself.

THE WAR DISPUTES ACT, BETTER KNOWN AS the Connally-Smith Act, made provision for the prosecution of strikers and their leaders in the case of work stoppages called contrary to the procedures it laid down. It also gave statutory authority to orders of the War Labor Board, but it left to the executive the methods by which these were to be enforced. Hitherto, the problem of applying sanctions has not often arisen; compliance has been refused in only seven cases out of a thousand. But the exceptions include the notorious recalcitrance of John L. Lewis as well as the less publicized obstinacy of certain corporations. And, so long as it was unable to crack down on Lewis, the WLB was reluctant to recommend government seizure in the case of the corporations. Now the President has issued a directive providing for sanctions against both employers and employees. Non-compliant corporations may have their plants taken over and operated by the government or be denied contracts or priorities for materials and transport. As the act itself prescribes, plants may also be taken over in the event of a strike, but the executive order amplifies this provision by directing that in such circumstances dues may be withheld from the offending union and held in escrow—if a checkoff is in effect. Other contract "benefits, privileges, or rights" may similarly be denied. This order has been criticized by R. J. Thomas of the United Automobile Workers as diminishing the standing of the WLB in the eyes of the workers. The President, however, cannot be blamed for refusing to nullify the act by failing to implement it. Responsibility rests on Congress and there the remedy must be sought.

THOUGH CHESTER BOWLES IS PURGING OPA of its professors in accordance with the instructions of Congress and bringing in "practical business men" to take over price control, he himself is showing "professorial" twinges. Faced with a practical job to do, Bowles is beginning to see that there was some sense in the measures which got his predecessors into trouble with Congress and the press. Two off-hand remarks at a press conference last week reveal his difficulties and his state of mind. Bowles said that present restrictions on grading and standardization made it very hard for him to "keep a chocolate bar from becoming half chocolate and half its former size and still sell for the same price." This, from a famous advertising man, must seem almost impious to Congressmen who attacked grade labeling as a first step in the Sovietization of American industry. When a reporter asked Bowles whether he thought OPA should control profits, Bowles replied, "Very definitely not. . . . Profit control is up to the Treasury." This was orthodox. But Bowles was honest enough to add that when sellers appeal for a higher maximum price, it is necessary for OPA to take the appellant's profit position into consideration. That's all the professors were trying to do when they were accused of trying to undermine the profit system.

THE THIRTY-FIVE-CENT-A-BARREL BOOST IN crude-oil prices, for which Secretary of the Interior Ickes and the oil industry have been campaigning, would cost consumers an extra billion and a quarter dollars a year. The Labor Policy Committee of the Office of Price Administration, made up of Julius G. Luhrsen of the Brotherhoods, Boris Shishkin of the A. F. of L., and J. Raymond Walsh of the C. I. O., is to be commended for its forthright report attacking the increase for the steal that it is. Leon Henderson, as Price Administrator, consistently refused to permit an increase in the price of crude oil "to encourage more production." On oil, as on copper, he believed quite rightly that the sound way to get more production was to pay a premium for new output rather than allow an over-all price increase. The profits of the big oil companies are booming; National City Bank reports that fifteen leading oil companies showed profits, after taxes, 20 per cent above those of last year. Despite the assertion that higher prices are needed to encourage the finding of new fields, the labor committee quotes experts "in Mr. Ickes's own Department of the Interior who have said that 'exploratory work is at an all-time peak.'" If necessary, let's offer government aid for wildcat operations and a premium price for new production. But why fatten the oil trust with additional profits?

THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS, THE LEADING Catholic lay organization in the United States, have adopted a resolution urging that nothing be done to offend the religious susceptibilities of the Italians during our temporary administration of their country. "It is essential in the choice of persons to administer such temporary functions," the resolution continues, "that care shall be taken to avoid entrusting those functions to anyone who is professedly or generally known to be opposed to the general views of the Italian people in the matter of religion." If this advice is followed and only approved Catholics permitted to collaborate with Amgot, most of the present leaders of the opposition to Badoglio will be barred. So, indeed, would Garibaldi and Mazzini if they were still alive. It must be remembered that there is a strong secular tradition in Italy carried over from the days when the country was struggling against Austrian and Papal tyranny. For while Italy is a Catholic country, not all Italians are professing Catholics and many professing Catholics are thoroughly anti-clerical. Nor are they likely to forget that the church was willing enough to strike a profitable bargain with Mussolini and that it has done little to curb Fascist abuses these last twenty years. All the same, we do not think the Knights of Columbus have much need to worry so far as our military and civil authorities are concerned. The church has too many good friends in the State Department and other high places, and the Administration has always been keenly alive to the weight of the Catholic vote. In fact, as the one mass pressure group in this country which has a definite foreign policy of its own, the Catholic church exercises an altogether disproportionate influence in our international affairs.

THE SLOW WAR OF ATTRITION AGAINST THE Japanese in the South Pacific yielded rather remarkable results this past week. In the occupation of Vella Lavella some thirty-four Japanese planes that sought to prevent the landing were destroyed. A few days later a light American naval force intercepted a Japanese attempt to retake the island, seriously damaging three destroyers and sinking an unspecified number of landing barges loaded with Japanese soldiers. Meanwhile, some 225 Japanese planes were caught on the ground at Wewak, New Guinea. All but ten of these were destroyed in a series of devastating raids which cost the United States only six planes. During the same period American Liberators carried out three record-making 2,500-mile attacks on the great oil port at Balak Papan, Borneo, destroying refineries and ships in the harbor. Progress was also achieved in ground fighting in New Guinea, while in Burma, American and British flyers have defied the monsoon to make several large-scale raids on important enemy installations. Although Japan clearly cannot be destroyed by air power alone, there can be no question that the recent stepping up of United Nations air strength in the Pacific is bearing fruit. The evacuation by the Japanese of their battered forces on Kiska frees the Aleutians of the enemy and strengthens the northern arm of the pincers that are slowly tightening on the "co-prosperity sphere."

CAPTAIN EDWARD V. RICKENBACKER, IT IS now revealed in a dispatch to the New York Times, "swept over India during May and June like a fresh breeze, bringing a wealth of news and cautious optimism, and leaving with unorthodox views on the China-Burma-India theater of war." Now the "fresh breeze," blowing in from Russia, has swept over New York and deposited some more unorthodox views. Bolshevism, Captain Rickenbacker reports, has been much maligned in this country. Not by the Dies Committee and the National Association of Manufacturers, but by the Communists. They have tried to make Americans think of Russia as the fountainhead of radicalism, when in fact the Soviets "have been constantly turning to the right"—so much so that "if they keep going on as they are you'll find Russia coming out of this war the greatest democracy in the world, while if we keep going on the way we are we'll be where they were twenty-five years ago." Rickenbacker doesn't content himself with vague interpretations; he cites facts to illustrate Russia's strides toward democracy. He was particularly impressed, according to one of his interviewers, with "the iron discipline in industrial plants, severe punishments for chronic absenteeism, incentive pay, and compulsory overtime work." Russia puts up with "no labor difficulties." Then, too, "nowhere in the world have I seen so much respect for progressive rank in the army . . . which is in the direction of capitalism and democracy." In his actual observations Rickenbacker sounds almost like a Trotskyist. But then the boundless admiration of the man breaks through; the wistful hope that Washington might model itself on Moscow. He has seen the future, and it works.

Work or Fight!

SO FAR there has been little response to the new order of the War Manpower Commission directing pre-Pearl Harbor fathers to seek jobs in essential industries if they wish further draft deferment. The order is clear and sensible. It extends the list of essential pursuits which offer prospect for deferment, and adds to the previous list of non-deferable occupations. Since the procedure is simple, the United States Employment Service expected to be swamped with applications for war jobs from fathers who wished to remain home with their families as long as possible. It was hoped that there would be sufficient applications to alleviate the critical man-power shortage which has been crippling some of our most essential war industries. For the order was, in a sense, an offer of blanket deferment for fathers—provided they accepted war jobs. Fathers who want deferment can obtain it; those who prefer to enter the services, and there are doubtless many, will be subject to eventual induction.

The failure of any large number of men to respond to the order seriously imperils the entire man-power program. If men cannot be persuaded to fill the gaps in essential industries by this new "work or fight" order, it is obvious that a national service law will have to be enacted. We do not regard the passage of such a law as something to be avoided at all costs. For years we have argued that the same principles of service should apply on the home front as on the fighting front. But as a means of meeting the immediate emergency, the WMC order has many advantages. Requiring no cumbersome new administrative set-up, it should have yielded maximum results in a minimum of time. For however convinced one may be of the justice of national service in theory, it is evident that there is at present no agency capable of putting it into effect quickly and efficiently. The setting up of such an agency would involve a serious loss of time.

Why, in view of its many advantages, has the recent WMC order failed to yield immediate results? There appear to be several reasons. For one thing, many men hesitate to give up good civilian jobs for temporary war jobs. They are apparently relying on the thirty-day period of grace usually granted registrants to change jobs after classification in 1-A. United States Employment Service officials point out, however, that this provision does not apply to men who have not registered with the Employment Service. But the main reason why draft-age fathers are not flocking to the employment offices is to be found in the widespread impression that Congress will put an end to the WMC's program as soon as it reconvenes in September. Responsibility for this impression rests with a handful of opportunistic Congressmen who have rushed into print in recent weeks with angry denunciations of the WMC's plan for "disrupting the American home." It is doubtful whether these Congressmen represent a large section of Congressional opinion, but their statements, and the wide publicity given to them in the newspapers, have served to sabotage efforts to divert draft-age men into essential industries.

Assuming that men like Senator Davis and Representative May, who have been among the leaders of this Congressional opposition, would not deliberately wish to interfere with our war-production program, we can interpret their actions only as an ill-considered bid for the votes of draft-age fathers and their wives. Surely no one would seriously maintain that dependency status or family relationship should take precedence over contribution to the war effort as a basis for draft deferment.

Actually, the Congressmen who are so concerned about protecting fathers from the draft may in the end open the door to measures more disturbing to civilian life. For if the present work-or-fight order fails of its purpose, a national service act is inescapable, and such an act would allow much less freedom of choice than is now available to draft-age fathers. Furthermore, if the present arrangements for permitting fathers who wish to do so to enter military service rather than accept war jobs are superceded, the time will most certainly come when young fathers will be drafted regardless of occupation or choice. It may be that we shall have to have both national labor service and stricter Selective Service regulations before the war is finally won. Meanwhile, it is to the interest of every American to see that the recent WMC order is given a fair trial.

"Strictly Confidential"

ON JULY 31 a subcommittee dealing with policy for the allocation of American food made a report to the Food Advisory Committee headed by Secretary of Agriculture Wickard. The report was marked "strictly confidential," in the way beloved of officialdom, but fortunately its contents leaked to the press. We would like to see it obtain wide circulation, for it is the best and most constructive criticism of the Administration's food policy from a progressive point of view that we have seen. The authors include some of the best younger officials in the capital. E. W. Gaumnitz, formerly of the Department of Agriculture, is chairman of the subcommittee which prepared the report. Collaborating with him on it were Abe Fortas, Under Secretary of the Interior; Dewey Anderson, of the Lehman relief organization; Bernhard Knollenberg of lend-lease; Brigadier General Carl A. Hardigg of the War Department, and J. M. Cassels, secretary of the War Food Administration. Unfortunately, their recommendations run counter to the tide in Congress and the farm lobby, as well as to the ndividualistic habits of the American farmer.

Most of the pet ideas of the farm lobby are stepped on in the report. The subcommittee directs its fire particularly at the politically sacrosanct concept of parity. An attempt to restore the relationship which existed beween the prices of farm and factory products before the ast war is a hindrance rather than a help in obtaining he maximum nutritive production for present war purposes. The price of wheat, under the parity formula, as he subcommittee courageously points out, is much too high, that of milk too low. The lesser shibboleths of current farm-problem discussion are treated with equal emerity. The subcommittee does not find either lack of man-power or lack of machinery a major factor in hampering increased food production. Reports of both have been greatly exaggerated by the farm bloc. And one of he report's principal conclusions collides head on with he dominant attitude in Congress toward agencies which would help the agricultural underdog. "The greatest opportunity for more efficient production in American griculture," the subcommittee says, as the friends of arm security have been saying, "is the small and medium-ized farm whose resources are partially wasted for lack of credit and good management."

The subcommittee is heading straight for a fight with hree of the most powerful agricultural interests in this ountry—the beet sugar, cotton, and tobacco farmers. It would cut sugar-beet acreage one-fourth in irrigated areas nd eliminate sugar beets entirely in non-irrigated. It would reduce the planting of tobacco, a crop which is a heavy consumer of fertilizers that could be used to better dvantage elsewhere. It would cut production of short-staple cotton, which we do not need, and provide an increase in the planting of long-staple. In passing, the report sideswipes the cotton-textile industry by suggesting a reduction of 25 to 30 per cent in the civilian use of cotton goods because "cotton-mill capacity cannot meet present military requirements as well as current civilian consumption levels."

The subcommittee not only is for subsidies but would stamp out black markets by having the government control all wholesale buying operations. It believes that because of increased production by smaller farmers and the decline in the number of itinerant truckers, the government must itself "assemble" food in each region. It sees this as one method to prevent a scandalous waste of food in areas where "flash" surpluses develop. Thus the subcommittee points out that in 1942 one-third of the Texas cabbage crop went unharvested, and this year a bumper crop of carrots in California's Imperial Valley was saved only by dehydrating them. The subcommittee suggests special feeding facilities in factories and revision of the rationing system to iron out certain inequalities, and it even jogs the housewife by declaring that "a shocking percentage of the food which comes into the American kitchen is wasted."

It is easy enough to understand why officials were anxious to keep this bold report "strictly confidential." It may yet raise a storm in Congress. But it is a pity that its explanations of fundamental food policies cannot be broadcast to every farmer, housewife, and processor. For if we are to feed ourselves and extend some help to others, we shall all have to change our habits as the war continues and the need for more efficient utilization of farm land, labor, and crops becomes apparent.

Politics Won't Wait

SECRETARY HULL, in recent months, has frequently rebuked any concern with international politics by saying that the only thing that matters is to get on with the war. Consequently, there is something symbolic about his journey to Quebec to consult with the President, Prime Minister Churchill and Mr. Eden, for it is an open acknowledgment of the fact that political decisions are essential to getting on with the war and that military and political strategy are inextricably mixed.

Take the matter of the second front, for instance. On purely military grounds there may be good arguments for waiting until next spring. By then Germany will have been more thoroughly softened and we shall have had time to take full advantage of the victory over the U-boat by concentrating an unbeatable weight of material in Britain. Invasion, under such circumstances, might mean far fewer casualties than an attempt to storm Fortress Europe today. That is an immensely important consideration, but we should try to understand why, to the Russians, it does not seem paramount. To them, the most important thing is to finish off the enemy quickly. And now that they have bled the Reichswehr white and started to turn it back, they see the opportunity to secure victory, provided that we bring to bear the full power we have assembled in Britain and the Mediterranean.

We need not fear, perhaps, that if Russia is forced to fight on through the winter without relief it will be defeated. But while we are saving our men's lives, they will be losing theirs—and their losses have already been stupendous. We have to consider also the fact that Russian food supplies are dangerously low and delay will exact the price of many civilian lives. Nor must we forget the growing toll that starvation and disease are taking of the peoples of occupied Europe. We cannot assess the costs of victory only in terms of our own losses.

It is true that Anglo-American operations in Europe, particularly in the air, are doing something to reduce the pressure on Russia—more, perhaps, than Moscow appreciates. But unless we can do something more to force the removal of a significant fraction of the German strength employed in the east, it is to be feared that Russian bitterness will increase and with it a suspicion that the reasons for our delay are political as well as military. We have to remember—for the Russians have not forgotten—that there were powerful forces in America and Britain which sought to bring about a situation in which Germany and Russia would rub each other out, and that even today there are voices which mutter about the necessity of barring Russia from Europe. No doubt, Moscow exaggerates the influence of such voices but they add their quota of poison to an atmosphere already heavy with suspicion and serve to increase the fear that we are planning for a Russia too exhausted to interfere with our peace plans.

Writing in this issue of the Nation, Blair Bolles in Washington and Frederick Kuh in London agree that, in the words of the latter: "Around the planetary second front difficulty revolves a chain of satellite troubles." There is no need to enumerate these troubles, which are dealt with fully in the two articles, but they are nearly all matters which could be disposed of, given mutual confidence and goodwill.

The question of the German Committee in Moscow, which has so agitated the American press, is a case in point. Set up without consultation with the western powers—just as they failed to invite Russia's views on Italy—it has been widely discussed here as a possible move towards a separate German-Russian peace. Goebbels, taking his cue from such fears, has used it as a weapon in his campaign to split the Allies. But as William L. Shirer has pointed out in the New York Herald Tribune, his domestic propaganda line indicates his awareness of the true import of the Moscow Committee —a skilful Russian attempt to enlarge the fissures beginning to appear in the Reich. For, so far from telling the German people of hopes for peace with the Soviets, he warns them that Allied unity has been achieved by America and Britain, giving Stalin a free hand to "Bolshevize Europe." He dare not inform them that the precondition for peace proposed by the German committee in Moscow is the liquidation of Hitlerism.

Some American commentators have complained that, whatever the propaganda worth of this committee, the manifesto it has been allowed to publish indicates that Russia is prepared to make a "softer" peace than we are. This criticism would have more force if America and Britain had definite plans for dealing with a defeated Germany. So far their only published program is "unconditional surrender," which leads inevitably to the question: "After unconditional surrender, what?" A political question again, but one which we can neither safely thrust aside until the end of the war nor answer satisfactorily except in agreement with Russia.

We write before the end of the Quebec Conference but, whatever is decided there, the next move seems plain. There must be an invitation to Stalin to join with Roosevelt and Churchill in coordinating immediate strategic plans and laying the foundation of a common peace policy. For the recall of Ambassador Litvinov—a development on which we will comment more extensively next week —suggests that we have reached a political crisis with grave military implications.

Why Stalin Didn't Come

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, August 20

THE Quebec conference is a conference on Russia, even though the Soviets are not represented. President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill arranged to meet on the St. Lawrence in order to discuss a military problem the solution of which holds the key to a greater political problem, the future course of relations between the Soviet Union and its two Western allies. The question at Frontenac is simply this: how shall the United States and Great Britain manage their share of the European war from here on?

Shall the war be short and bloody? Or shall it be long and so managed as to save a maximum of Anglo-American lives? The short and bloody war is the war with a western front, opened by attack from English bases against the strong defensive line put up by the Nazis along the coasts of France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. The short and bloody war, in other words, is the war of the "second front," as the Russians define that term. The White House, the State Department here, and the Foreign Office in Whitehall are convinced now that the whole Russian question turns on the opening of a front—call it second, third, or fourth—which will draw half a million Axis troops from the eastern battlefields.

The White House, the State Department, and the Foreign Office are convinced also that the alarms raised during the past few weeks about the state of the Atlantic democracies' relations with the Soviet Union lack validity. Josef Stalin holds aloof from Quebec mainly because there is, in his opinion, no second front; if he maintains his aloofness after a second front becomes a fact, there will be warrant for despair about his disposition to make common political cause with Britain and the United States. For Stalin the second front alone can be proof of the Western allies' good will toward his country; and conversely, a second front would put to the test Russia's good will toward us.

Relations between the United States and the Soviet Union have developed in a disturbing fog of suspicion and fear, which have so beset both countries that one is tempted to dismiss the diplomats and call in the psychiatrists. The Soviets fear that capitalistic nations want nothing more than to assist in Russia's downfall; sections of the American population, on the other hand, see a menace to their way of life in the doctrine of world revolution which they still imagine the Soviets hold in store. Captain Rickenbacker is one of the few old-guard American reactionaries who rightly note Stalin's disinclination toward world revolution.

In view of these suspicions, illuminated occasionally by a flare of criticism on one side or the other, it is remarkable that the two countries have made the diplomatic progress they have since 1941. Slowly the bases of a lasting friendship are being laid.

American policy toward the Soviets during the past two years has stemmed from the White House. Secretary of State Hull spoke honestly last week when he said he was ignorant of plans made for Russian participation in the Quebec talks because such matters were handled by the President. Mr. Roosevelt monopolizes the Russian question, and Sumner Welles encourages him to believe that Russia can be won over; on this point Judge Hull is a skeptic. The President has worked earnestly to let Russia know that toward the Bolshevik state this capitalistic government has only good will, and Stalin is gradually becoming impressed by this determined effort. It is notable that in the same week which brought the Tass announcement that the Soviets had not been invited to Quebec, the Russians indicated their trust in us by taking Ambassador Standley on a tour of Soviet factories.

The first evidence of this country's favorable disposition toward Russia came on June 2, 1941—three days after the German attack. It is understood here that the Russians suspected that Great Britain might turn on them when the attack came and that the United States might help the British; this was a suspicion born of the orthodox Bolshevik notion that the capitalistic powers must of necessity want the Soviets' destruction. Instead, Sumner Welles on June 25 announced that the neutrality act would not be invoked for the U. S. S. R. The Russians could buy war goods in the United States. We were not going to help destroy the Soviets but were going to do what we could to keep them going.

The second evidence of good will was the extension of lend-lease assistance. These two actions confounded Germany. The Nazis believed with the Russians that the capitalistic powers would welcome a chance to destroy the Soviets, and with this thought in mind they sent Rudolf Hess to Britain as special legate with an invitation to the English to ally themselves with Germany for the Russian kill. The British declined and today Hess languishes in captivity, the British have a twenty-year alliance with Russia, and the Germans are being ground to defeat on the fields of the Ukraine.

Errors have been made in our relations with the Soviets during the past two years. The War Department in the summer of 1941 tended to confirm the Russians in their suspicion of American hopes when one of its spokesmen told newspapermen the Soviet Union could last only two months. Jesse Jones aggravated the situation by withholding the petroleum-refining equipment which had been promised the Russians. But the patience of Roosevelt and Welles obscured those irritants, and the Kremlin, abolishing the Comintern, continued to creep closer to full faith in its Atlantic allies.

Sometimes the President's good will has found rash expression, and the consequences have not been happy. When Foreign Commissar Molotov visited Washington in June, 1942, the White House issued a communiqué which appeared to promise a second front that same year. Actually, it promised only that the United States would do its utmost to make arrangements for a second front. But it was a document of dubious wording, dashed off in a moment of exuberance by the President. The result was that the Russians subsequently charged us with breaking our promise.

For all his good will, President Roosevelt has underestimated the difficulty of the Russian problem. Thinking that it was primarily a matter of supply, he appointed Admiral Standley as ambassador to Moscow; and Standley, a good naval officer and a good distributor of war materials, has been consistently inept in dealing with the major political and psychological phases of Russo-American relations. Then again, Mr. Roosevelt welcomed the appointment of Maxim Litvinov as ambassador to the United States without understanding that Litvinov was far less a power in 1941 than he was in 1933, when Roosevelt and Litvinov exchanged the letters which brought about American recognition of the Soviet Union.

The shortcomings of Standley and Litvinov underscore one of the great obstacles in the way of cementing friendly relations between the two countries, namely, difficulty in communication. Standley has been unable to convey to the Russians any idea of the handicap which our participation in the war against Japan gives us in any effort to help Russia directly by a strategic operation. He has failed to impress the Russians with the problems involved in transportation across the Atlantic, with the result that the Russians last winter complained that they were getting less American war material than they should.

To overcome this difficulty the President sent Joseph Davies and Harry Hopkins on special missions to Moscow. But the normal channels for exchange of views are simply inadequate. Litvinov has been called home, probably to stay, and an obscure chargé now manages Russian diplomacy on Sixteenth Street.

Even more fundamentally, Mr. Roosevelt underestimated the Russian difficulty by his failure to evolve something specific in the way of a post-war foreign policy for the United States. What do we want to do about Germany? We don't know; we have no policy. Russia knows, and not caring to wait for us to act, it encourages a Free Germany Committee. As long as we have no policy for Europe's reconstruction beyond the Atlantic Charter's pious wishes, we can expect the Kremlin or Pravda to make known the Soviets' unilateral policies from time to time.

Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill could put the relations of the Western powers with Russia on a better footing by announcing their faith that the Soviets will not make a separate peace with Germany. Perhaps it is forgotten that Russia's alliance with Britain is attended by a Russian commitment not to make peace alone. Russia in the main has honored its treaties. Perhaps it permitted the American recognition agreement to be violated by Comintern agents, and it seemed to repudiate the treaty with Finland which settled the winter war. But aside from these two instances, its diplomatic record is clean. It consistently upheld its commitments in the League of Nations. It abided by its treaty with Turkey. It maintained a strict observance of its 1939 agreement with Germany. And—to our hurt, but to its own honor—it has remained faithful to its neutrality pact with Japan. Britain, therefore, has reason to trust that the Soviets will observe the Anglo-Russian treaty.

Russia sees the world realistically. Above all, it wants security in which to reconstruct a shattered country and proceed with its socialist experiment. That security calls for a quick finish to the war and a peaceful world after it. For the quick finish Russia wants a second front. After the finish we can take up the difficulties of the Baltic States and Poland, the problems of Persia and China, and all the other differences which exist between Moscow and Washington. As long as there is no second front Stalin will continue to hold aloof from Allied conferences.

Let's Look at Labor

VI. WORLD STRATEGY FOR UNIONS

BY ADOLF STURMTHAL

FROM the viewpoint of European labor the question of whether or not it will be possible to establish close collaboration with American workers after the war is a matter of historical significance. Subject to pressures from Washington and London on the one hand and Moscow on the other, European labor will anxiously look to the American working class for assistance both in resisting American conservative influences and in frustrating Communist efforts to dominate post-war developments on the Continent. Without such aid it is possible that Europe will be the victim of a conflict between American-led reactionaries and revolutionary forces under the control of the Soviet Union. Such a development would threaten not only to split the United Nations into hostile camps but also to nip in the bud any democratic and progressive forces that might emerge from the downfall of Hitlerism. Only if American and British labor can at least neutralize reactionary intervention in Europe will the European working-class organizations have the strength to resist the powerful attraction of Moscow and thus obtain that freedom of action which must be their primary peace aim. For American labor, Europe will be either a threat or a guide, according to whether reactionary régimes succeed in imposing sweatshop conditions for the purpose of international competition or whether European reconstruction is firmly used as a great experiment for obtaining full employment and rising living standards.

Persuasive as the case for international cooperation is, neither the history of American-European labor cooperation nor the present situation warrants any great hope that the need for closer understanding will be universally recognized. Indeed, the record of what happened twenty-five years ago is a warning against excessive optimism. The relations between American and European labor organizations in the somewhat similar situation at the end of the last war were such that an able historian of that period, Austin Van der Slice, was led to speak of "the wide rift" between the movements during 1918 and 1919. Samuel Gompers and his followers were full of contempt for their colleagues overseas. In his autobiography, Gompers, describing a conference with French Socialists, recalled that he "listened to their fantastic and irrational proposals as long as I could endure them." As president of the Commission on International Labor Legislation at the Peace Conference, Gompers cooperated with the employers' delegates from the United States in deleting from the British plans for the International Labor Office of the League of Nations a clause which would have given the conventions of the I. L. O. the force of international law. It was only with the greatest effort that an open clash with the European labor delegates could be avoided. The European labor leaders reciprocated in kind. Sidney Webb requested a member of the American Embassy to keep certain American labor delegates out of England and France, because, as he put it, "they had a disturbing influence on labor and Socialist circles in France."

It is, perhaps, encouraging to recall this sad period in the history of international labor, for it tends to show that, after all, some progress has been made. During the last five years the American Federation of Labor has been affiliated with the International Federation of Trade Unions, and although contacts between American and European delegates are far from being frequent, a certain amount of practice in the field of international cooperation has been acquired. Within the framework of the International Labor Office, American labor delegates have formed part of the Workers' Group, which is under the general direction of the I. F. T. U., and Robert Watt, the main American delegate, has made many friends among European labor leaders. Some American unions are members of the International Trade Secretariats, which organize the workers of the same trade on an international basis. All in all, these contacts have probably served to eliminate the most glaring misunderstandings on both sides, which made the attempts at cooperation twenty-five years ago so painfully unsuccessful. Both sides know each other at least to the extent that they are aware of the divergencies that exist between them and the difficulties in the way of effective cooperation.

First among these difficulties is the matter of organization. The American labor movement is split into five parts: the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., John L. Lewis's United Mine Workers and their District 50, the Railroad Brotherhoods, and the independent unions. Only the A. F. of L. is affiliated with the I. F. T. U. and thus has direct contact with European centers, such as the British Trades Union Congress. The bulk of American labor does not belong to any international organization and has little understanding of the problems involved. Under John L. Lewis the C. I. O. did less than nothing to establish contacts with European workers, preferring to find in Latin America affiliations that would make up for the increased stature which I. F. T. U. membership has given the A. F. of L. (More recent efforts on the part of the C. I. O. are making up for this neglect of international relations.) Unofficial offers on the part of the I. F. T. U. to mediate between the two American factions were scorned by both. British unions in recent years have felt a need to approach American workers in industries vital to lend-lease and the war effort, but an I. F. T. U. ruling stood between the British unions and those Americans who were members of the C. I. O. For according to well-established tradition only one trade-union center in each country can be affiliated with the I. F. T. U., and the A. F. of L.'s monopoly position prevented the establishment of liaison between the British and the C. I. O.

It might be argued that in the interest of more intimate international cooperation the rules of the I. F. T. U. ought to be modified so as to admit the C. I. O. in addition to the A. F. of L. It is possible that this solution will finally be adopted in some form, but one should not overlook its dangerous implications. For the "one center only" tradition was built up in a period of internecine strife within the trade-union movement in Europe and has been one of the most powerful preventives of internal splits. To abandon this rule might give encouragement to factional strife at a time when the unity of the labor movement may well be the prime condition for its resurrection and survival.

Another difficulty arises from the undeniable fact that not all parts of American labor are committed to a policy of international cooperation. Isolationist views are held by labor groups as well as by others. For the time being, however, it seems probable that at least a majority of organized labor could be won over to anti-isolationism.

The problem of the Russian unions is another disturbing element. I shall point out later how I imagine that this could be settled in a way satisfactory to both the Anglo-Russian Trade Union Committee and American labor. Few observers will doubt, however, that, today at least, the Russian question is probably the greatest stumbling-block to closer American-European labor harmony.

Closely connected with this is the fourth great difficulty involved in such collaboration—the divergencies in aims and general outlook between the labor organizations on the two sides of the Atlantic. Most American unions continue to regard only a small range of problems as their real concern, disregarding altogether or relegating to the second rank all wider issues. Their attention is focused upon wages and hours to the almost complete exclusion of the more basic questions of social and political structure. This, as I have shown elsewhere, was also the attitude of European labor, even in its political organizations, during much of the period between World Wars I and II. But it is unlikely that it will be the attitude of European labor leaders at the end of this war. In a much deeper sense than the United States, Europe will face the task of reconstruction. In most countries on the Continent the problem will consist in building a new society out of the chaos left by the collapse of Hitler's overlordship. In England, the basic changes of an economic and social nature that have already occurred or that are inevitable at the end of the war are of such a magnitude that the job will not differ essentially in scope from that faced by the Continent.

The European unions will continue to devote their attention to wages and hours, social insurance, and similar matters. But they will be compelled to see these questions against the background of the needs of a reborn nation, and they will therefore have to understand that wages and hours form part of much wider issues, such as the general institutions, the policies, and the structure of their new society. A few American labor leaders have begun to adopt a similar point of view and to look at labor problems from the broader standpoint of general policies. But the great majority are still alien to such attitudes and remain committed to a narrow interpretation of their members' trade interests. I fear that they will show little understanding of the peculiar needs of their European colleagues and will react with the same impatience Samuel Gompers displayed in 1918. John L. Lewis's reception of the National Resources Planning Board program for a developed system of social security could not fail to remind one of his once close association with the anti-political stand of Sam Gompers. It is the political attitude of European labor and its interest in issues which American labor leaders consider outside the legitimate field of action of trade unions which will constitute one of the main divergencies after the war.

In spite of these difficulties, I believe that effective cooperation can be established, provided both sides abandon the illusion that all parts of the international labor movement must be patterned according to the standards of the organization in one particular country. It is impossible to hope for full identity of views between, let us say, Soviet and American labor. But once it is admitted on all sides that the international organization of labor will have the job, not of standardizing the movements in the various parts of the world, but rather of expressing the highest common denominator of their interests and objectives, some measure of cooperation will be possible and will probably not be fruitless. The European organizations must learn to accept American traditions as a fact and pin their hopes on the gradual but unmistakable change in practice which has become patent in the last decade. American labor will have to endeavor to understand the peculiar situation of the European labor organizations and the state of mind of their membership during a period of unprecedented turmoil. American and Soviet labor organizations could coexist only in the framework of such a loose, world-wide federation, which would include labor groups of the most diversified nature. Within such an organization a closer tie could be established among those member groups willing to accept stricter rules.

At least, some of the undeniable differences between American and European labor—and also among the European labor organizations themselves, which are far from being uniform in organization, thought, or action—could be evaded if the program of joint action were to stress concrete objectives rather than general ideologies. It might be possible, I believe, to obtain agreement among the trade unions on both sides of the Atlantic on action in favor of such objectives as these:

1. The establishment of democratic régimes in postwar Europe.
2. An international organization which would guarantee peace by collective action.
3. The establishment of institutions and the adoption of policies tending toward full employment everywhere and the expansion of international trade.
4. The development of the I. L. O. as an instrument to coordinate the international advance toward higher standards of living and high levels of employment.

Closer contact between the leading personnel of American trade unionism and European labor figures now in exile might contribute to prepare both sides for working together in the future. Not only would the American labor leaders discover the types of problem with which their Continental colleagues have to deal and their ways of looking at them, but a basis for mutual action on specific issues might be found. Together these groups could obtain the assistance of the I. L. O. in preparing their plans for the future and thus act as a joint labor group within the framework of the international parliament of labor, which might have an invaluable part in the reconstruction if a unified labor movement existed to take advantage of it. Nothing would better prepare for future cooperation than common action now.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE CABLE of 1866 breaks down again, but opportunely, so far as public news is concerned, during a general lull in politics, owing to the adjournment or dissolution of the chief legislatures of the world.—August 6, 1868.

THE PASSAGE of the Corrupt Practices Bill occurs simultaneously with some promising symptoms that the old mode of soliciting votes for candidates is to pass away together with bribery.—August 6, 1868.

NO NEW campaign stories about the candidates worthy of mention have appeared since our last issue. . . . Grant has committed no new crime, but his cotton and other frauds increase in magnitude and variety, and the depravity of his father and brother are gradually being revealed. As described now day by day in the World, he is probably the vilest man on earth.—August 13, 1868.

THE PUBLIC MIND in England is occupied mainly . . . with the canvass preparatory to the coming election. . . . Lord Bute, a young man at college, has undertaken to decide who shall be returned by the great borough of Cardiff which lies in his estate, and the Duke of Portland has written a most comical letter of admonition to his tenantry, showing an extremely defective education and mental powers of the lowest order. The outcry against hereditary peers, and the talk of life peerages, in the meantime grow stronger, and such incidents as these of course stimulate them.—August 13, 1868.

PARIS, JULY 31, 1868.—The wind of opposition seems to be blowing all over France, and it may increase to a hurricane which will sweep away not the Imperial government itself, but its blind supporters. . . . The editorial offices of the Paris and Lyons newspapers resound daily with blows and fights; writers are spit upon, revolvers are drawn, and duels are of daily occurrence.—August 13, 1868.

TO ANY PERSON interested in lies and liars the Presidential campaign offers an opportunity for successful investigation that is rarely met with. At no other period do liars show themselves so fearlessly and are the lies to be seen in such abundance and variety. . . . The interest of the occasion to the scientific observer may therefore be imagined.—August 27, 1868.

Private Hargrove's Army and Mine

BY WILLIAM H. JORDY

Camp Grant, Illinois

A RECENT copy of Publishers' Weekly in one of the surprisingly good regimental libraries at this army post assures me that Sergeant Marion Hargrove's opus is still dispatched in carload lots to corner drugstores. By now it has become a kind of Bible of Basic Training. That is probably due to the fact that it says what most people want it to say. It tells about the fly-on-the-nose while standing at attention, about the halting manner of inexperienced sentries, about innumerable hard-boiled sergeants, about stupendous quantities of K.P. All these hoary truths and fables concerning the ignorance and irresponsibility of the rookie are of course considerably gilded by the colorful speech which seems to be characteristic not only of Hargrove but of all privates at Fort Bragg.

This elaborate verbosity only emphasizes the fact that the army into which a civilian is drafted today is not quite Hargrove's. It's the difference between beginning and end, between dipping in at the top of the man-power barrel and scraping the bottom, between pre-Pearl Harbor training for "defense" and post-Pearl Harbor training for actual combat areas. It's a subtle difference, but real.

The Manhattan contingent leaving Pennsylvania Station on June 25 for the reception center at Camp Upton, for example, might have sensed this difference as it walked a ragged double file down steps that led to a slat-seated troop train as old as the last war and maybe older. Quietly entering another stairway, almost unnoticed in the clamor of roped-off relatives, a well-disciplined file of boys, bronzed from maneuvers, lugged duffle bags toward some port of embarkation. The difference between the two files was only six months. The new recruit would never debate the problem of whether or not he would again don "civvies" at the end of a year's training, as Hargrove and his buddies had debated. His officers would never preface a gas-mask drill with "If some enemy . . ." but rather with "When you go over. . . ." And when he'd finally been outfitted and classified and shipped out of Upton to a basic-training unit to learn the A B C's of soldiering, he might ask, "What happened to the other boys?" (Meaning of course those who had slept in his tent before he arrived.) Some non-com would answer, "Almost every damn one of 'em went to permanent units, and then overseas."

Few of them stay in training camps a year or more as they used to. Six months—that's the average. This makes for a soberness that suddenly interlards even the noisiest horseplay, affecting all but those few who want action at any cost. The Chicago papers are sold outside the mess hall, the Allied inroad into Italy is carefully noted, and it is commonplace for someone to remark futilely, "Hope they keep right on advancing so we won't have to go." The older training films were obviously made on the fields of North Carolina, or Kentucky, or New Mexico; the latest ones show the real thing. The battalion bulletin board includes, along with notices of USO dances, detailed instructions for "Disposition of the Dog-Tags of Deceased." Just as casually, talk of death creeps into conversation.

"If I die, it's two casualties. My father's got a coronary collusion, and the slightest shock . . . Know what a coronary collusion is? It's a clot in the heart. A blood clot in the heart! Now come on, soldier, dig down into those cookies. Go ahead, help yourself."

The older men are especially apprehensive, and nostalgic too. There are many more of them in the army today than the average citizen thinks. It's a far cry from Hargrovean days, when oldsters of twenty-eight were mustered back into civilian life. Our lieutenant says, "When they ask me, 'Are they drafting fathers?' I tell them to visit my platoon. I'll bet a fourth of the men in it have children." And these are by no means all post-Pearl Harbor births. One draftee, twenty-nine years old, children four and six, complained at Upton: "So I asks my draft board, I asks them, 'Now I thought they wasn't draftin' fathers.' And they were nice, very nice, but they says to me, 'We're sorry, but we have quotas to fill.' " Someone suggested he appeal to the Red Cross. Maybe he did.

However, by far the largest number of fathers only became such some time after December 8, 1941. And, as far as Selective Service is concerned, these fathers are as eligible for the draft as single men, which is in fact the only possible legal solution. But no law can prevent a father of however few months from pulling snapshots from his wallet every chance he gets. No law can keep him from being wistful or make him less fearful of his possible destiny. And no USO mixer can pry him from a nightly letter back home or force him to enlarge his circle of friends beyond certain limits. He tends to find a few cronies, and, except for them, to remain aloof. Usually he is resigned to his fate; sometimes he is unhappy as hell.

Take the six who live in my tent. They're probably a typical lot, and they epitomize what has happened to the man-power supply since the lush days when Private Hargrove really was a private. Two are married, and one of these has a baby. One, twenty-seven years old, is unmarried but psychologically "settled." And, since it is a June contingent, three are fresh out of high school. What has happened? The man in the middle army age bracket (roughly twenty to twenty-five)—single, more experienced, surer, more sophisticated than the average high-school graduate—is not here. He has either passed through his basic training or is still in a war plant. And while it may be true that the boy of eighteen makes the best soldier, there can be little doubt that the men of twenty to twenty-five are the leaders in Hargrovean horseplay and army rah-rah. The older men are usually too preoccupied, while the high-school graduate will generally be a better follower than leader for the greater part of his basic training. And the high-school graduates take on more of the apprehensiveness of the older men than you might expect.

Even as he reads of new beachheads, each man realizes that in all probability he will be part of the swelling tide six months from now. If he is ambitious, he realizes that it is becoming increasingly difficult to climb up through the ranks, because of the large number of officers commissioned last year, and because many of those still required are justifiably being selected from men who have distinguished themselves in foreign service. Many of the special training programs have been completely filled. And he realizes that, as he starts his basic training, headquarters companies are already being formed in Washington for new divisions. He realizes that they will be "activated" in ninety days, and maybe activated with him—him and his ninety days' training. Maneuvers. Then overseas.

It's not that he isn't courageous. It's just that—well, his friends "hung around" for a year or a year and a half in training camps. A year is a lot of living. Six months just isn't. He's no coward, and he'll end up a good soldier—he'll have to. But beneath the traditional burlesque of rookie training—fly-on-the-nose, sentry jokes, hard-hearted sergeants, K.P.—the swiftness of training, the contraction of opportunities for advancement, the dwindling supply of man-power, the impact of total war, and the inescapable fact that he'll be in it within a few months—these, taken together, make for an underlying tension that Private Hargrove never knew.

Why Teachers Leave School

BY MICHAEL PACA

WORKING as a file clerk for a federal agency here in Washington, and earning a salary of $1,620 a year, is May Dobman. Before this "big money" lured her to the Capital, May was a school teacher in South Dakota, at $900 a year.

Among May's classmates at State Teachers College was Agnes Morse, who gave up teaching for a job in an aircraft factory at $33 a week, twice what she made in the schoolroom.

John Hunter, social-studies instructor, who also doubled in English, was drafted from his teaching job, and at a private's pay of $50 a month, plus bed and board, is financially making out a trifle better than he was.

Add up the May Dobmans, Agnes Morses, and John Hunters in every state, and you have a measure of today's crisis in education—more than 75,000 teachers lost, to industry or the armed forces, during the 1942-43 school year. This is in addition to the normal loss of 58,000 through such causes as marriage, retirement, illness, and death.

"Our teachers are quitting so fast it is difficult to keep a record of their resignations," says an Idaho school superintendent. Resignation rates are at unprecedented peaks in all parts of the country.

The inevitable result is that "Closed" signs are being hung on many a classroom door—20,000 is a conservative estimate of the number that will be shut this coming school year because "teacher is absent." Classes that remain open will have to resort to overcrowding, lowered teaching qualifications, and other doubtful expedients. In Breathitt County, Kentucky, for example, twenty-eight teachers will operate fifty-six schools, spending the first three days of the week at one school, and the last three at another. Other crisis measures include the granting of 37,000 "emergency certificates" to teachers who in many cases have no more than a high-school education.

But even these and similar steps are not sufficient to save some schools. Fall River, Massachusetts, has shut up two primary schools, closed eight rooms in five different school buildings, and discontinued a boys' and a girls' industrial-arts shop. One district in Missouri will not open any of its schools at all this year. In countless places essential services are being eliminated.

Some officials are trying to avert the collapse of their school systems by pressing into service married teachers who have been discharged within the last few years, by calling out of retirement elderly teachers, and by urging college-trained home-makers to teach part time.

BURLINGA
PUBLIC LI

When these barrel-scraping measures are exhausted, however, the schools will hit bottom as far as their supply of teachers is concerned. The problem will be worse next year, because teacher-training institutions which ordinarily supply about 65,000 new teachers each year are today one-third empty. Selective Service has taken more than three-fourths of the men enrolled for training as teachers, and the young women who in peace looked to teaching as their only hope now look elsewhere.

We shall probably feel until 1950 the results of today's falling enrolments in teacher-training institutions. We know for certain that few teachers will be graduated in 1944, 1945, and 1946. Unless many more new students enroll in pedagogy classes next year, we shall have only a handful of newly trained teachers in 1948 and 1949—years which according to present birth-rate indices will see unprecedented numbers of children crowding into the primary schools.

The effect of these conditions upon the lives of the young may not be evident for years, but the price will be high, in delinquency and in incompetence to assume the responsibilities of democracy. Apparently we—or at least those who are supposed to represent us in government—prefer to pay that deferred toll rather than to forestall it by putting out the requisite cash now.

For all diagnoses of the crisis in education boil down to this basic fact: teachers are forsaking their profession because of low salaries. Selective Service is taking a certain proportion of male teachers, to be sure; but the greatest losses are among those who cannot or will not live on a teacher's pittance while prices are rising and more adequate salaries are available in almost every other field.

Living costs have risen 20 per cent since Pearl Harbor, teacher salaries only 8 per cent. Forty teachers in every 100—about 360,000—were paid less than $1,200 last year. Nearly eight in every 100 received less than $600. The low salaries are not confined to any one section of the country, as witness the fact that twenty-six states employ teachers at less than $600 a year.

The problem is nation-wide, and we are making no progress in solving it for the same reason that we made no progress in meeting the problems of unemployment or old-age insecurity until 1933. Up until that year we refused to recognize those issues as of national concern. We left them for the local community to handle. Today, we are leaving it up to 119,000 different school districts to meet their own problems of education. Some of these districts are wealthy and provide excellent school services. The vast majority are totally unable to provide adequate services even during peace; under strain of war, they have collapsed completely.

A national attack on our educational problem is called for, but there is no sign that such an attack is even being seriously considered, so inextricably are the public schools caught in the web of states' rights, local autonomy, local prejudices, and local politics.

The wonder, however, is that an Administration that has fought for recognition of unemployment, old-age insecurity, and other social problems as national issues has "been adamant against federal aid to education." The words in the quotation marks are those of Senator La Follette. They were spoken at the Senate hearings on the "Keep the Schools Open" bill. This bill, which was sponsored by Senator Thomas of Utah, called for $300,000,000 of federal funds to be apportioned among the states to raise substandard teacher salaries and to bolster the poorer states in their efforts to pay the costs of education. Senator La Follette pointed out that federal-aid-to-education bills have been studied and reported out of Congressional committees and calendared for consideration in the Senate since 1934. But they have all died on the calendar because of Administration opposition, always with the promise, as Senator Thomas added, that such a bill would be considered at the "next Congress."

"The question is, when are we going to get to that next Congress?" asked Senator Hill of Alabama.

"Mañana," answered Senator La Follette, throwing up his hands figuratively and literally.

Manaña certainly never dawned on Capitol Hill during the last Congressional session. In fact, education is still reeling from the slaps that Congress gave it. Washington is only now assessing the damage, which includes cutting out OWI's education division; abolishing the educational activities of OCD; refusing to grant funds to the High School Victory Corps, with its physical-fitness activities; and weakening the United States Office of Education by cutting its funds. And, of course, it did not even take up Senator Thomas's federal-aid-to-education bill.

Perhaps this record isn't surprising from a Congress that took a swing at "college professors" in OPA. The surprising aspect of this battle for a minimum of schooling for our people is the gap between word and deed in the record of the Administration.

Thus, President Roosevelt has told teachers that they are "performing a great service to their country," adding that "children must not be allowed to pay the cost of this war in neglect or serious loss of educational opportunity." Paul V. McNutt has said several times that "teaching is war work," and his War Manpower Commission has declared teaching an "essential" activity. The Budget Bureau, however, which is the President's mouthpiece on appropriations, has ruled that federal aid to education involves a "non-essential war-time expenditure of funds," and that enactment of the Thomas bill "would not be in accord with the program of the President."

Dr. Howard Dawson of the National Education Association, which is the chief sponsor of the bill, has said:

"To speak of expenditures on education as 'non-essential' reflects a callousness toward a public service which is a foundation stone of all we are fighting for."

Other examples of the same "callousness" might be cited. About a year ago the National Education Association asked the United States Employment Service to set up a nation-wide placement service for teachers similar to that provided for farm workers, veterans, and the handicapped. Such a service would at least have utilized the 1,500 USES employment offices for recruiting teachers in those areas where some potential teaching personnel might be found. John Corson, who was the director of the USES at the time, offered "all support" for this plan, but nothing happened, presumably because the USES had to concentrate on recruiting industrial war workers.

With this record of official callousness in mind, the teacher who reads government literature proclaiming "teaching as war work," "the classroom as a citadel," and "education as a weapon," and hears appeals to "serve America nobly by remaining at your post," is likely to respond coldly. Such appeals have been heard in the House and in the Senate and from national officials over the radio, but no reason has yet been offered the teacher why she should remain at a $600 post when she can serve America just as nobly at twice that salary.

Federal aid may not prove the complete answer to education's ills. The issue involved in this battle is more than a matter of $300,000,000 or the question of "federal control of schools," that bugaboo against which the Thomas bill has taken every possible precaution. The issue is whether as a nation we can afford to let our schools remain in the grip of local poverty; whether we can allow them to turn out half-literate, undereducated citizens—unfit to serve their nation at arms. The issue is also whether public schools shall lag behind every other public service; whether school budgets shall be the first to be cut in time of crisis and the last to be restored in time of prosperity. It is also whether teachers shall receive the rewards due a profession or whether they shall waste their teaching skills by taking routine or menial jobs that pay more. The issue, in short, is whether public education has any strength at all—whether its voice can have any meaning in the nation.

These questions may well be answered during the next session of Congress. Organized labor has already informed Congress that it intends to fight for a minimum salary of $1,500 for teachers. Another group, too, is girding its loins. Supported by a war-and-peace fund of $50,000, the National Education Association is at last out to wage systematic, Congressman-by-Congressman battle for the Thomas bill. Some say that the N. E. A. is at last serious on this issue because it needs a victory. Certainly the teachers of the nation, after years of being kicked around, need a victory. There is no reason why the Thomas bill cannot be used to achieve it.

IT WILL BE SIMPLE to overthrow the present American dictatorship when the boys come marching home, says the Laguna Beach, California, Post: "If a sufficient number of men in uniform read Pegler regularly it means they will reestablish democracy in America, on their return from the wars, even if they have to kill every political trickster in the country to do it."

A SIGN on a bus in Charleston, South Carolina, bears this message under a large red "V": "Victory demands your cooperation. If the peoples of this country's races do not pull together, Victory is lost. We, therefore, respectfully direct your attention to the laws and customs of the state in regards to segregation. Your cooperation in carrying them out will make the war shorter and Victory sooner. Avoid friction. Be patriotic. White passengers will be seated from front to rear; colored passengers from rear to front."

ROANE WARING, national commander of the American Legion, gave the recent annual convention of Wisconsin Legionnaires a lesson in semantics. Thus: "I am no isolationist. I don't believe in isolationism. Modern science has made this world too small for an isolationist to exist. I am a nationalist. I am not in favor of placing the destiny of this America of ours in the hands of any international organization of any kind under any circumstances."

VANCE MUSE, secretary of the Christian American Association, has notified his lieutenants in the field that the Association plans a drive to outlaw the closed shop in twelve Southern states. Its success in getting the legislatures of Arkansas, Florida, and Texas to pass anti-union legislation leads Muse to believe the drive will succeed in those states. The other nine are not named in his memorandum. The object will be to use the initiative laws to get the voters in each state to pass a Right-to-Work Amendment to the state constitution at the elections in November, 1944. The amendment would become law without legislative ratification.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Rome radio under Badoglio's dispensation maintains the Fascist tradition of accuracy in its broadcasts. The C. B. S. Shortwave Listening Station picked up this account of the glider crash in St. Louis: "Ten persons, including the mayor of the city, have been killed in St. Louis in a riot between troops and striking stevedores." . . . The Nazi authorities have forbidden the Czech Bible Society to publish or distribute Bibles. . . . A Bratislava newspaper complains that people who never employed Jews before are employing them now. . . . Anton Mussert, the Quisling of Holland, outfitted his personal bodyguard with fine leather coats. The Nazis have taken the coats for themselves.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Two Wars or One?

BY FREDERICK KUH

London, August 19, 1943, by Cable

THIS article is written before the conclusion of the Quebec conference, and before the achievement of that gathering can be estimated. Will it reconcile the immense discrepancy which exists between the clarity of our military purposes and the obscurity of our political objectives?

In 1917, we conducted a lucid political war. We demanded that democracy replace absolutism. Our ideas stirred millions of people within the Central Powers, and it made them waver or turn against their autocracies. When sailors at Kiel mutinied and the Germans shouted for peace, we did not reprimand anyone for speaking discourteously of Wilhelm II, nor did we commend Hindenburg when he advised the Kaiser to abdicate. But today, when Italians, especially in the northern industrial cities, are demanding peace and the popular revolutionary temper is rising against Badoglio's militarist dictatorship, what encouragement do we give them?

We say that our future military operations require an orderly Italy. Any popular uprising in favor of democracy is likely to involve dislocation or upheaval of our well-laid plans. Do we prefer an autocratic Italy, undisturbed by any breeze of progress? And if this is our notion of expediency in Italy, does the same policy hold for smaller Axis countries, for Germany itself, and even for Japan? If this is our political-warfare platform, will it ease the tension between the Western Allies and Russia? It is true, as the weekly Economist cunningly points out, that "the practice of dealing with fascist or autocratic governments as an incident in a developing military strategy is not unknown at the Kremlin." But are we making any attempt to render such dickerings either by the Soviet Union or by ourselves unnecessary? Or do we, on the contrary, plan to allow the political war to drift until Europe crumbles, only to find that our ideas then openly collide with Russia's?

The post-war settlement is bound to involve conflicting principles of political philosophy. But to assume that the divergence of our outlook and Russia's is irreconcilable is to embrace absolute defeatism and to admit that the end of the war must bring new and greater conflict. United Nations leaders have repeatedly declared that the differences in our social systems are no barrier to friendship with Russia, and Russia has echoed that statement. But how do relations stand with Russia today?

The Soviet is resuming its agitation for a second front which will divert about a million German troops from Russia. Stalin has publicly recognized the value of British-American air raids on German industries, harbors, and communications. He knows that our invasion in the Mediterranean has prevented Hitler from drawing additional forces from his reserve pool to send to Russia. But he is also aware that during the coming winter the Red Army will again have to cope with the great bulk of the German army (the British say two-thirds; the Russians say four-fifths). The Soviet wish for a more equal American and British share in the war on Germany is, by far, the sorest spot in our relations today. Some British officials consider it shockingly bad form to dwell publicly upon our differences with the Soviet Union. But any doctor will confirm the fact that antiseptic treatment of wounds is essential, if indecorous.

Around the planetary second-front difficulty revolves a chain of satellite troubles. In June the Russians were prepared to grant full recognition to the French Committee of Liberation in Algiers. But the Washington and London governments asked Stalin to wait. Reluctantly he agreed. The Russians believe that one of the main factors in the American fondness for Giraud is his "safe" anti-Soviet bias. Before Giraud left France last November he visited a number of French garrison towns, including Toulouse, where he addressed French troops. He expressed the view that weakening Russia was in the best interest of France.

Early in June Eduard Benes, President of the Czech government in exile, was to leave for Moscow to sign a twelve-year Czechoslovak-Soviet military alliance. There is a difference of opinion as to whether any agreement exists which obliges Britain and Russia to secure one another's consent before concluding a treaty with a third power. In any event, as Benes was preparing to leave, the British government persuaded him to postpone his visit, according to the conservative weekly Spectator.

Recently, too, the British and Russians were on the verge of signing an agreement to regulate air travel between the two countries through the Middle East. Divergencies arose. Air traffic between them has now been suspended because the Russians, pending a settlement, refuse to permit entry into the Soviet Union of passenger airplanes from Britain. This is a minor incident which would never have arisen had there not been greater underlying differences.

Relations between Soviet Russia and the exiled Polish government, broken off nearly four months ago, are still ruptured. The United States and Great Britain have been trying to patch things up, but the breach remains—just one more rift between Russia and the United Nations, revealing again the larger unsettled problem of all Eastern Europe.

The Allies created AMGOT without consulting the Soviet government, and then Moscow went its own way by establishing the Free Germany Committee. That Committee, although certainly not intended as a government to be imposed upon defeated Germany, is nevertheless the rallying point for opposition in the Reich. The American and British governments showed no marked degree of pleasure when the Russians called this German committee into existence without first informing Washington and London. If the establishment of AMGOT suggests that we want to put an Allied military government in charge of Germany, then the emergence of the Soviet-sponsored German committee seems a Russian answer—an invitation to leftist elements in the Reich to take over the management of their own country in alliance with the Soviet Union. The entire development of relations with Russia—from the major second-front issue to the recall of Maisky from his valuable ambassadorship in London—explains the Economist's conclusion that "the outlook is not encouraging."

It is conceivable that we and Russia, while both fighting Germany, are waging two different wars. Are we both engaged in an anti-fascist struggle? Take Spain. Lately, Franco has reinforced the Spanish Blue Division, which is fighting at Germany's side in Russia. Meanwhile we are considering giving tangible support to Franco. He has asked America and Britain for armaments, planes, tanks, and machinery. American Ambassador Hayes presented Franco's request to the State Department sympathetically. When I told one of Spain's most celebrated republican leaders about this, he laughed. "Fine," he said. "That just means that when we inherit those arms from Franco we won't have to pay for them." But if the British and American governments grant Franco's request, their purpose will hardly be to bestow a gift of second-hand weapons on the Spanish revolutionaries.

It may be granted that we might obtain certain advantages from Franco as we did from Darlan, and as we conceivably might by a deal with Badoglio or Schacht. The Iberian Peninsula is Germany's only source of tungsten, the mineral used for hardening steel and producing armaments. We certainly have a stake in persuading Spain to reduce or halt its exports of tungsten to the Reich. Germany also receives sheepskins and goatskins from Spain with which to clothe its troops more warmly during the Russian winter. We should be happy to see Spain offering less warmth to the Reichswehr. Then again there is the Iberian air line between Madrid and Stuttgart, sometimes used for smuggling contraband to Germany and for even more sinister purposes. Until recently, 65 per cent of the shares in this company were in German possession, 35 per cent in Spanish hands. Now Franco has purchased a 51-per-cent control of the air line. He is in a position, if he wishes, to bridle German abuses of that traffic.

LOST OPPORTUNITIES

"We have permitted the Badoglio government to gain time for the Germans in preparing the defense of northern Italy and we are in danger of losing touch with our chances of bringing over to the Allied side those very considerable elements amongst the Italian population whose sympathies, like those of the Sicilians, are anti-German and anti-Fascist. This seems to have occurred very largely because we have concerted with our Allies no such combined strategy of offensive political action as we have done in the field of military strategy. There exists no political agency comparable to the combined chiefs of staff and no comparable understanding with the Russians to that which so clearly exists between our military authorities and the Russian high command. Until we do have a thoroughgoing offensive program in which military and political factors are jointly considered and coordinated, we are constantly open to surprise in the political field. We shall see more lost opportunities in the future, and perhaps of worse effect, for the political problems facing us will tend to grow in importance, just as the political problems of Italy already exceed in importance those of French North Africa."—MAJOR GEORGE FIELDING ELIOT in the New York Herald Tribune, August 17, 1943.

Readers of The Nation know that we have been saying this week after week. We cite Major Eliot's comment as a military man's testimonial to the interdependence of the political and the military.

Such tactical advantages are doubtless in the minds of those favoring the delivery of Allied arms to Franco. They would admittedly fit in with our economic-warfare tactics. But one must weigh them against the immense political price of supporting Franco. Against whom would the Spanish dictatorship use our arms? Against its German and Italian friends? Or against a revitalized republicanism in Spain? Are we this time to hear of the necessity of supporting the Falangist order against democracy, rechristened "anarchy"?

Our political aims must be as clear as our military targets. We are not sending our men into battle and compelling fascism to abdicate in order to enthrone another brand of absolutism.

BY ARGUS

SINCE the end of July the polemics of the German press and radio have shown that the curve of morale, already declining for some time, has taken a sudden sharp drop. Three new notes, never touched before, are now being played with great vigor: (1) exhortations not to lose faith in Hitler; (2) complaints that "demoralization" is not exceptional but universal; (3) outbursts against the heresy that Germany has come to the end of its road and has no strength left.

On July 30 Friedrich Hildebrandt, Gauleiter of Mecklenburg, told a mass meeting:

> There are situations in which even strong characters may be temporarily discouraged. Let us summon courage. This struggle is not being fought for the maintenance of a régime. We acclaimed the Führer when he turned the tide for us in 1933—why should we forget to be faithful now? It is not his fault. The fact that the Führer does not speak now is not a sign of weakness but of strength. . . . There is no way to victory except under Adolf Hitler.

On July 29 the "leader" of the farmers in the province of Carinthia, one Herr Huber, warned: "A party member must now have courage, even in the face of unpopularity."

A Pomeranian newspaper wrote on August 1:

> We should not make the mistake of considering this situation more serious than it really is.

And on August 2:

> Every German who loves his country and is convinced of the Führer's historical mission is now enduring a spiritual inferno. Where is the way out?

A Württemberg paper on July 29:

> Anyone who thinks we no longer hold any trump cards in our hand is quite mistaken.

A Baden paper on the same day:

> Most deplorable are the Don Quixotes who drop their ears like donkeys before a precipice. There is no reason why we should deny that just now a great number of such asses are suddenly appearing around the corner.

The same paper on August 1 protested against the rapidly increasing number of Nazi Party members who either hide their party badges or leave them off altogether:

> Down with all those spiritual swine who are willing to break their oath to the party, and who now, by withdrawing from politics, are trying to prepare an alibi for any eventuality.

The Swiss Appenzeller Zeitung on August 3 published Impressions of a Swiss Traveler in Germany. The first "discrepancy between official German reports and the facts," the traveler noted, appeared while he was still on the train. Eastbound trains are "filled beyond capacity. Trains are so crowded that passengers have to get on and off through the windows." The hotels are just as bad. "In Berlin I had to stay with friends because the hotels were booked for weeks ahead. There is no bed linen and one has to sleep on a tablecloth or an uncovered mattress. Hotel sheets and blankets have been requisitioned for the bombed areas."

There has been much talk lately about the fact that privations and even air raids have not aroused hatred of England. A German correspondent of the Stockholm Aftontidningen, in a story published August 1, reported that the most astonishing phenomenon in Germany now is "an immense wave of Anglophilia." People speak English with foreigners at every opportunity and discuss England with barely concealed enthusiasm. "Especially on the upper levels of society sentiment is frankly pro-British."

These observations seems to be borne out by a new theme that has appeared in German newspaper articles and radio commentaries: warnings not to expect any help from England in preventing the Bolshevization of Germany. The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, for example, declared on August 1 that England would not play an important part in framing the peace under any circumstances. Roosevelt and Stalin, it said, would brutally trample the little Churchill underfoot. And in any case the Anglo-Saxons "have resigned themselves to the fact that Europe will fall victim to Bolshevism, regardless of whether they or the Bolsheviks predominate in the rest of the world."

"Canceled Victory Monuments." Thus the caption of a photograph published August 6 in the Stockholm Aftontidningen. The picture showed a giant pile of granite blocks marked "Property of the General Building Inspector, Berlin." The accompanying story says that 550,000 cubic meters of the most beautiful Swedish granite were ordered by Germany for the construction of so-called "victory temples"—one, for example, at the Nazi Party stadium in Nuremberg and another near the Soldiers' Hall in Berlin. But after 50,000 cubic meters had been taken to Germany a counter-order came from Berlin to discontinue deliveries, and the Nazis tried unsuccessfully to cancel the agreement. Since then stockpiles of granite have risen in various parts of Sweden—canceled victory temples.

Fascist Network

UNDER COVER: MY FOUR YEARS IN THE NAZI UNDERWORLD OF AMERICA. By John Roy Carlson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

CYNICAL Americans who have been the least willing to believe that the domestic fascist movement is more than a crackpot fringe of small-time racketeers should be moved out of their complacency by John Roy Carlson's book, "Under Cover," the most complete and documented exposure of the totalitarian and "nationalist" network I have seen in ten years of reporting the activities of homespun fascists. It is the democratic counterpart of Elizabeth Dilling's spurious "Red Network," and if it were widely enough read it could be the antidote to the campaigning of the McCormick-Patterson newspaper axis for an isolationist America.

Most sinister of Carlson's revelations is the detailed reporting of the intimate relations existing between important Congressmen and the large bloc of fascists operating anti-Semitic and pro-Nazi propaganda mills across the country. Most of this material was gathered by Carlson, when, as George Pagnanelli, he became one of the small band of reporters and investigators who joined the Bund, Ku Klux Klan, Christian Front, and other subversive organizations and conspiracies to obtain first-hand information for future exposés.

He discovered these high-ranking Congressmen working with the "nationalist" network in order to defeat President Roosevelt, or to smash Wendell Willkie's career, because these men are the vivid symbols of international cooperation with Britain and the Soviet Union. Because the subversives' ranks include scores of thousands who hate England and wish to see her destroyed, and because many, many thousands more blindly hate the Russians and would prefer to see them defeated by the Nazis, these Congressmen have found energetic recruits for their "crusade" against all who advocate domestic and international liberalism. Even today some fifteen to twenty Congressmen lend their prestige to the "nationalists." These legislators have not hesitated to travel hundreds of miles to speak at rallies called by men whose anti-Semitism is very thinly veiled and attended by hysterical audiences, principally made up of women, who still boo President Roosevelt and all Jews and are silent when Herr Hitler's name is invoked.

This fascist rank and file is said to number 1,000,000. There is good reason to accept the figure. Carlson became a professional joiner. He watched, up close, the German-American Bund, the Christian Front, the National Workers League, the Mobilizers, Flanders Hall, Joseph McWilliams, and Gerald L. K. Smith in action. All this activity is reported in detail. He was frightened at times, as were newspapermen who sat in, secretly, on rabble-rousing Nazi demonstrations in the hearts of our big cities. But he was more concerned over the gnawing of these totalitarian zealots at our simple freedoms. He became even more frightened when Senator Nye, "nationalist" hero, told him that "a third party is the only solution." And when Senator Wheeler said of the thirty-three fascists recently indicted that "all these men are guilty of is anti-Semitism."

Carlson-Pagnanelli could have written more effectively. His recital of the activities of Americans who unwittingly or for some payment have been dangling on the strings of Axis agents here is too episodic and loses force because Carlson felt he had to eliminate from his book mention of those men and movements that he did not observe at first hand. The result is the almost complete absence of Father Coughlin and his minutely organized following in Brooklyn and Boston. The fascist movement has centered around the radio priest, who is now awaiting the moment for a resurgence from silence. The Royal Oak parish is still Mecca to the entire "nationalist" network, as is evidenced by the excursions there and the celebrations in his name. Carlson also fails to tell the story of the America First Committee. This, too, is unfortunate, because what Coughlin was, spiritually, to the fascist movement, the A. F. C. was politically.

However, Carlson has provided liberals with the first detailed blueprint—with names and addresses—of American fascism. The attacks upon the book and the recent efforts to suppress it and to frighten dealers into removing it from their shelves are sufficient evidence that Carlson has spent his Pagnanelli years well. His series of indictments have hit home.

Coils of the Past

AT HEAVEN'S GATE. By Robert Penn Warren. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WHAT with the clamor these days for a home-grown literature to feed the national ego, I am afraid that Robert Penn Warren's new novel may not get the critical attention it deserves. For like his first novel, "Night Rider," it does not exploit any popular or literary current, nor does it have any of the rhetorical fanfare, any of the shock-effects, that served to arouse interest in many recent pieces of writing. Yet "At Heaven's Gate" achieves a combination of intelligence and narrative pace all too rare in contemporary fiction. For Warren has worked the tragic symbols of the Southern mind into a fast and highly charged story.

In a sense, "At Heaven's Gate" is a regional novel, drawing its material and its pathos from the strains of Southern life. But it should be immediately distinguished from those regional tintypes that make a cult of the hinterland, with the hope of finding some deep human meaning in the simple and the primitive. For the South takes shape in Warren's novel as a kind of national entity, working out its fate on various levels of existence. Like Faulkner and other typical Southern writers, Warren reproduces that characteristic mixture of timeless ennui and compulsive, almost aimless, violence. But in Warren the ennui is a little more conscious and the violence a little less aimless, as he takes the lid off the tense and pent-up life of the South, baring its traumatic memories, its stunted ego, its straining to uncoil its social and cultural past.

The brunt of the meaning, however, I should hasten to add, is borne by the narrative itself; and except for the obvious fatality of the end and the device of a parallel folk tale, which I take to represent the folk-conscience of the South, the values of the novel are yielded by the tensions of the characters. Significantly, the pace-setter of the action is a taut and wilful girl, Sue Murdock—a creature of her passions, which she can neither control nor comprehend, and which in the end necessarily destroy her. Obsessed by a father image, Sue catapults herself into several affairs, going from one masculine extreme to another, in a fevered search for her identity. She leaves home in order to break the hold of her father, Bogan Murdock, a successful, power-driven symbol of authority and calculation. She breaks her engagement to an upright and simple-minded fellow, whom she had seduced and tried to mould to her needs, but who has been sucked into her father's career world. Finally, Sue goes slumming in the bohemian, radical quarters of the town, and becomes the mistress of a kind of provincial Gidean character, a young poet and pugilist, thriving on his sensations and the immorality of his art. When she discovers that he is a homosexual who cannot give her any moorings, she turns to a strong-willed and unimaginative labor organizer and strike leader. But in his routine sense of order and purpose her new lover recalls once more the hated father symbol, thus completing the cycle of Sue's impulses, leaving her utterly selfless and drained of even her instinctive urges. As Murdock's financial empire collapses, and he looks to the heroic martyrdom of the South to nourish his stamina, we are left with the tragic image of an unfulfilled culture, without hope either in tradition or revolt, yet seeking spasmodically some kind of community.

Evidently Warren has turned his back on the agrarian movement among Southern writers, with its pining for the past and its will to recreate the Southern tradition. And to this, it seems to me, one can trace much of the power and some of the weakness of his book. It is apparently the source, for instance, of the novel's clarity of structure and its note of finality. At the same time, "At Heaven's Gate" lacks something of the energy of unfoldment, the moral drive, that usually comes with the involvement of the author in his story. None of the characters is able to carry the accents of the author: certainly not Sue or Murdock, and Slim Sarret, the intellectual dandy, is too immature and pretentious. And while Warren commands a prose of unusual elasticity and modulation, it plays too often on the psychological margins of the story, creating at times a poetic rather than a dramatic intensity. As a result, some of the more crucial moments are muted and almost lost in tonal effects.

But there is no point in harping on these shortcomings in a work that is at once so conscious and so brisk, and that sustains, for the most part, the level of its large human subject. And in the present state of the novel, "At Heaven's Gate" has the special value of demonstrating that unconsciousness is not a prerequisite for the writing of fiction.

Moscow Diary

TWELVE MONTHS THAT CHANGED THE WORLD. By Larry Lesueur. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

LARRY LESUEUR of C. B. S. has added a very interesting diary to the goodly number of correspondents' books about the Soviet Union. Lesueur's title leans on John Reed, the style and concept of the book are reminiscent of Bill Shirer's "Berlin Diary," the ground covered has been trodden into a fine dust by the feet of a score of Anglo-American newsmen, most of them authors of books, yet Lesueur's 345 pages of personal observations are well worth reading, not only for the student of contemporary Russia, but for the average intelligent American interested in going a little deeper into the subject than the daily press takes him.

Like most of his colleagues in Moscow during the last two years, Lesueur spoke little Russian, knew little of the history of the country. If he has studied the complex political theories of Marx and Lenin on which the Soviet system is based, he leaves such material out of his book. He confines himself almost entirely to what he saw and heard, and to how he and other Americans felt about it. His regular contacts with Russians were limited to a dozen secretaries and several girl friends, but in addition he managed to have many interviews with Soviet functionaries.

One of the most interesting of these was an interview with the People's Commissar of Education—scholarly, white-haired Vladimir Potemkin. In his remarks the commissar gave advance notice of one of the most significant developments in the Soviet Union, namely the abandonment of coeducation which was to take place some months later and the official recognition of the necessity of giving girls courses in household economy and the rearing of children while teaching boys the art of war.

In another interview the head of the cinema industry told Lesueur that in 1942 more escapist films would be made in order to help the Russian people relax from their titanic labors. Like Eve Curie, Lesueur interviewed General Andrei Vlasov, later to become Russia's only noteworthy Quisling.

Lesueur's descriptive powers are considerable. He manages to create an excellent picture of the Arctic port of Archangel in a few tightly written pages. Several descriptions of Soviet children stick in the memory: little tow-headed Vassily, who reflected soberly that the like of him are put in the infantry, not in the air force; and, in a newly liberated district, ten-year-old, one-armed Ivan, who had blown up a German munitions dump and had blown his arm off at the same time.

Lesueur arrived in the Soviet Union in October, 1941, from Britain. On his nerve-racking voyage aboard a freighter full of TNT he was worried for fear Russia would collapse before he got there. He and his companions made plans to evacuate via the Trans-Siberian Railway. When he landed in Archangel, his fears were confirmed by the first impact of Russian confusion and primitive backwardness. By the time he reached Kuibyshev via the Urals, however, he had changed his mind, and was confident of Russian victory. He was sure, likewise, that America would need Soviet Russia as a post-war friend.

Like most correspondents' books on war-time Russia, Lesueur's diary does not answer any of the great questions about the Soviet Union: what makes it tick, where it is going, how the people feel and live. I cannot help comparing these contemporary accounts with one written a century ago—"La Russie en 1839," by the Marquis de Coustine, a French monarchist. This traveler managed to find out in a few short months what the Russian people were thinking, what made them the way they were, and in what direction their development was taking them. He managed, moreover, to write all this down clearly and readably, in excellent prose studded with political and philosophical comments, many of which are as true today as when they were written. The work remains one of the best books on Russia. American correspondents tend to be fast, earthy, reasonably honest and accurate, but we somehow have not yet been able to produce a single book about Russia like De Coustine's, though Larry Lesueur's is one of the best attempts. Mobilizing an Empire

THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH AT WAR. Edited by William Yandell Elliott and H. Duncan Hall. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE shape of American relations with the British countries in the future is one of the keys to the future of the world. It is not the only key, for Soviet-American and Chinese-American relations will bulk large, not to forget relations with Latin America and with the numerous small nations the world around, whose case is today being overlooked in our obsession with size and the power associated with it. But the mere statement of fact about the British is a long way short of an enunciation of policy. It is over what the policy should be that disputes will come, not over the need for having one. On both sides—British and American—there is altogether too much idle chatter about the need for keeping together and too little concrete discussion of what the two peoples are to keep together for. Even Mr. Elliott, an Anglophile of long standing, is not enthusiastic about the pre-war leaders of the United Kingdom: creatures of "a complacent old Empire," "a smug ruling class that nurtured up its own destroyers," and so on. Emanuel Shinwell, from an English point of view, the other day expressed skepticism of satisfactory collaboration with any America other than that of Roosevelt and Wallace (though he did not pause to resolve the ambiguities within that America). In short, there are forces and traditions within both communities which are regarded as inimical to satisfactory collaboration by groups in each. Of course this is because neither is a monolithic community. The antagonism which Mr. Elliott feels for the appeasers of England he also feels for their opposite numbers here at home, and similarly with Mr. Shinwell and his hostility to the economic imperialists he sees lurking behind Roosevelt and Wallace. Both would willingly collaborate to realize what they are for, but they both fear collaboration that might advance what they are against. They do not stand alone. They merely symbolize the fact that international collaboration is a catch phrase, the content of which is x until it is worked out in practice.

Even though Professor Elliott says that his symposium is a "tract for the times" in favor of American-British collaboration, the worth of the volume does not arise from any brilliance of argument to that end. Even his own contribution, a short introduction, is calculated as much to offend skeptics as to convert them, and the more lengthy contributions of the junior editor, H. Duncan Hall, are of even more decisively negative worth to "the cause," with their hypertrophied moralism, fierce invective, and perfervid imperial patriotism. The worth of the volume, by a stroke of irony, is almost exclusively found in the excellent chapters contributed by the numerous collaborators.

These ladies and gentlemen did not feel it necessary to "sell" anything but information. Their essays are uniformly calm, careful descriptive analyses of the several British countries and their war-time problems. In spite of the fact that the articles are now mostly historical, in that events move faster than printers and binders, they are consistently valuable. Unfortunately, no single outline was followed in preparing them and comparisons and contrasts are difficult to make. The best the reader can do, save when he is in a position personally to supplement the text, is to make his comparisons and contrasts with the American scene. On this basis the United States comes off very well indeed.

Generalizations suggest themselves nevertheless. All the British countries were as reluctant to go to war as the United States. We are subject to no reproach on that score. Their pre-war armament programs were, when existent at all, either too limited in extent to matter, as in the United Kingdom and Australia, or not executed to the full extent authorized, as in South Africa. When war came, its prospective magnitude was universally underestimated and the respective contributions of the dominions were therefore misdefined. To a considerable extent this was the fault of the Chamberlain government of the United Kingdom. That government aimed to fight the war "on the cheap" and to base industrial war production on the United Kingdom factories, drawing on the dominions for men, raw materials, and food—that is, a planned reassertion of the pre-First World War pattern. Everything was calculated by Chamberlain to disturb business-as-usual as little as possible—industrial mobilization, labor control, foreign trade, finance. A somewhat similar line was followed in every dominion.

The fall of France transformed the picture. It stepped up every aspect of policy toward the level of total war and it brought the dominions into the picture in a fashion dictated by their true economic character. Their importance as industrialized countries was at last recognized. This was particularly true of Canada and Australia. But the stark and terrible fact was quickly revealed that no British nation, nor all of them in association, could hope to fight anything more than a defensive (perhaps merely delaying) action against the enemy, no matter how ruthlessly resources of men, money, and materials were exploited. Far from being a cheap war it was now shown to be an incredibly expensive one, beyond the resources of the British Empire-Commonwealth to win standing alone. This harsh conclusion underscores the immense significance which now had to be attached to the policy of the United States. From being a matter of guaranteeing a free flow of purchased goods and services from the United States—largely a case of operating within the neutrality laws and hoping for sympathetic administration and advantageous changes—it became a matter of gaining direct access to American supplies. The British financial resources in this country were rapidly being exhausted. The lend-lease law of March 11, 1941, nine months after Dunkirk, was the ad interim solution of this problem. Pearl Harbor, nine months later still, was the final solution. (I do not mean to imply that lend-lease was a British policy; it was an American policy which met British necessities.)

It was between Dunkirk and lend-lease that the British countries really began mobilizing their resources for war in a serious way and, on the evidence given here, they have intensified the exploitation ever since. Pearl Harbor caused a further and rapid intensification, especially in Australia and New Zealand.

This book is chiefly concerned with the "how" of that mobilization. It is an institutional study in its more rewarding phases. And within its limitations, it is an excellent and important job. The sections on the United Kingdom and Canada are the fullest and best, those on South Africa and India are fair, that on New Zealand good in so far as F. L. W. Wood supplied the text, and Part I of the Australian section, by Fred Alexander, is solid and informative, but Part II by Editor Hall is poor stuff. The tone is strangely at variance with the analytical approach of the other essays, and the handling of controversial matters is marred by moralizing and inept defenses of the United Kingdom which displace candid surveys of what happened. The unnecessary gaps in the information offered I must pass by for lack of space to detail and fill them in. But the worst section, also by Mr. Hall, is Fighting Ulster and Neutral Eire. This was certainly written under what Mr. Elliott calls "the compulsion of war emotions." Here Mr. Hall appears, not as the explicative scholar, but as the compleat scold and propagandist. To balance this curiously inappropriate performance I suggest a reading of the excellent essay on the same subject by Hugh O'Neill Hencken in the Atlantic Monthly for June, 1943.

I have reserved to the end a mention of the opening essay, The British Commonwealth of Nations in War and Peace, by Mr. Hall because while I think intra-Commonwealth relations are vitally important to Americans, few can be persuaded to be interested in them. Toward the end of his essay Mr. Hall remarks of the writer on the subject that "private family pattern may play a part in determining just where he fits into the general supernational family pattern—whether he exaggerates or underemphasizes a particular trend such as the independent status of his dominion in relation to the Mother Country," and so on. It is a pity that he did not bring this bit of insight to the level of consciousness before he sat down to his typewriter. He might then have explained the many attitudes toward, and theories about, the Commonwealth, instead of writing a sententious, but brilliant, defense of his own particularistic point of view, which is that of an imperialist with no sympathy for (or understanding of) those who emphasize the "independent status" of the dominions. Mr. Hall gives a distorted explanation of his subject by overemphasizing and arguing fiercely in favor of the forces of unity and identity under United Kingdom leadership and ignoring and even scoffing at the efforts of dominion spokesmen to give reality to the phrase, "equality of status," by achieving a reasonable semblance of "equality of function." Mr. Hall, of course, represents one school of thought about Commonwealth affairs—it flourishes most luxuriantly in England—but I do not think it is at all fortunate that a strongly partisan view should find such fulsome expression in a book of this character. It makes the book lopsided. Luckily the writers on the dominions make incidental mention of other points of view which will lead curious readers to go beyond Mr. Hall's essay in their efforts to understand this fascinating and important matter. Americans, after all, must be prepared to evolve correct attitudes and policies toward the dominions severally as well as the British countries collectively. In this task Mr. Hall's essay offers no help whatsoever. C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

A Priest's View of a Poet

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS, PRIEST AND POET. By John Pick. Oxford University Press. $2.75.

WRITTEN completely from the Catholic point of view, this little book presents, but for the agnostic or merely non-Catholic reader can scarcely illumine, what Hopkins himself might have called the "inscape" of his poetry—its essential distinctive nature, inextricably linked with that of the poet. At the very outset one is confronted with the problem that continues to tease the minds of those who delight in Hopkins's performance and personality but cannot accept his theology: exposed as the young university student was to such diverse influences, and living as he did in a period when religious controversy was exacerbated by the announcement of the Darwinian theory, how was it that so thoughtful a man, a rebel at heart, was converted to Catholicism rather than, let us say, to socialism?

In his discussion of Hopkins's spiritual development Dr. Pick is hampered by the lack of important material. As is well known, Hopkins destroyed his most intimate notebooks and also the poetry written before his entry into the Jesuit order—the latter act, which he apparently committed because he felt his verse to be "non-professional," is itself a commentary on the life-sapping atmosphere in which he labored. But it is less the want of sufficient documentation than it is his unquestioning adherence to the faith that Hopkins professed that prevents this biographer from making explicit to the outside world what the inner springs of the poet's conversion were. One closes the book with a sharper sense than ever of the gulf between the Catholic and the non-Catholic view. If, on the one hand, the non-Catholic finds it difficult to enter into an attitude which assumes that the "test" of literature is whether it is in "harmony [with] the dogmas of the Catholic church," on the other hand the man who finds that test sufficient cannot analyze a literary work in a manner satisfactory to one who rejects those dogmas.

There are, nevertheless, passages that address themselves to those who do not see eye to eye with the author. Dr. Pick has a good deal to say about Hopkins as a Scotist and is able to speak on the subject with authority. His discussion of Hopkins as a mystic is also valuable, and is of especial interest in view of the recent publication of T. S. Eliot's "Quartets," a religious work by a poet who has evidently made a study of St. John of the Cross but who is, more certainly than Hopkins, no mystic. For the sake of these chapters this little book should find its way to the shelves of all those concerned with poetry, though it will undoubtedly please only those whose definition of literature is as strictly limited as the author's. BABETTE DEUTSCH

"GENESIS"

GENESIS is one book which no reader of The Nation will want to miss. It is a remarkable long narrative poem with prose interludes — a true "new direction" in American writing. It tells the story of the making of an American (Hershey Green, a young Jewish boy growing up in New York) as it has never been told before, exposing with brilliant insight the manifold forces which condition a modern life. Genesis combines the story interest of a good psychological novel with the appeal of finely wrought verse.

The critic R. P. Blackmur has this to say of Genesis: "Mr. Schwartz is moving in the direction of Dante's type of sublimation, and upon much the same type of philosophical conviction. The difficulty he has had with his subject matter has been enough to demand of him the maximum poetic response, so that he has made a poetic, a living order. The hope expressed in his preface is here richly and variously gratified: 'There is in this work some truth about all human beings.'" (Kenyon Review)

IN BRIEF

AMERICAN DECADE. Edited by Tom Boggs. The Cummington Press. $3.50.

Decades mean very little in themselves, except as convenient markers or rulers; the decade of the thirties is supposed to be the limit of this anthology edited by Tom Boggs but, as a matter of fact, it spills over at both ends. Which is just as well. There is no particular reason for this anthology, at least none is evident. It does not purport to give a representative selection of work written or published in America during the thirties; it is doubtful that the sixty-eight poems printed would give anyone an adequate idea of the pain and sorrow of that period, or our real accomplishments and progress. Just the same, it is an interesting collection that Mr. Boggs has put together, edited with considerable discretion and taste. He has brushed aside the sterile and obscure and fashionable verse and put his finger on poems which are generally good and sometimes excellent. Some old friends, worth seeing again, are included: Karl Jay Shapiro's acid The Poet, Kenneth Fearing's Beware and Agent No. 174 Resigns, John Wheelwright's A Funeral Pall in Cellophane. Others worth noting are Robert Clairmont's The Wheelgoround and Reuel Denney's A Chiffonier with Glass Flowers. Impressive indeed is Words for Leadville, the longest poem in the volume, by Thomas Hornsby Ferril. The book is, except for one overcrowded page, a model of good printing.

DRAMA

Neither Folk Nor Art

FOLK art, it seems hardly necessary to say at this point, is art that is distilled out of a common and long-drawn-out experience by a process that goes on largely below the surface of consciousness. The process by which it is crystallized into expression—story, music, drama, design—is also long drawn out and not attributable to any single individual.

American Negroes, held in a slavery of two and one-half centuries which imposed both homogeneity and a common experience, constituted the nearest thing to a folk, strictly speaking, that we have ever had in this country. But Negroes can no longer be so classified, and any attempt to perpetuate the classification or to reproduce the forms of expression growing out of their experience as a folk can result only in sentimentality, condescension, and bad art. It is not possible, for instance, for a contemporary composer to write an authentic Negro spiritual, for the simple reason that the conditions which give rise to the true spiritual no longer exist.

It seems unnecessary to say all this. Yet it is clearly not understood by anyone connected with the latest "folk drama" to make its appearance, namely "Run Little Chillun" (Hudson Theater).

I don't know whether Hall Johnson, who wrote the book and lyrics, describes the piece as a folk drama, but everyone else does; and the internal evidence suggests that the author too has very confused ideas of what he is up to. "Run Little Chillun" is, indeed, worth writing about only because it exhibits so well the anomalies that are bound to rise from misconceptions of "the folk" and in particular of Negroes as a folk.

It is possible, of course, and often fruitful, for an artist to use folk materials; but the quality of the result will depend not on the particular materials but on the talent of the artist who employs them. In "The Green Pastures" Marc Connelly created a charming extravaganza based on Marc Connelly's conception of the Negro's idea of Heaven. He may have thought he was writing a folk play, though I doubt it; but his imagination knew better and overrode any such solemn and mistaken intention.

The solemn and mistaken intention is all too apparent in Mr. Johnson's opus; and unfortunately his imagination is neither strong enough nor creative enough to overcome it. The central situation is dramatic and plausible, and has nothing to do with folk. Jim, the son of the pastor of the Hope Baptist Church, has been seduced away from his church-going wife by the attractive and frankly carnal Sulamai. But Mr. Johnson turns this simple human situation into a grim, lumbering struggle for Jim's soul—and the community's soul as well—between the New Day Pilgrims, a nature cult which has set up shop across the river, and the Hope Baptists. There is a pompous note in the program on the "theology of the New Day Pilgrims," and the spectator gets the impression that Mr. Johnson is really going to tell him something about this strange Negro cult. The faithful presentation of the doings of any cult might be both entertaining and interesting. But what suddenly emerges, in the scene which purports to show the Pilgrims in full swing, is a typical Hollywood spectacle with pretentious and costly costumes and the kind of South Sea writhing which is Hollywood's stock prescription for ritual dancing (primitive) whenever the script calls for it.

The second big scene is a revival meeting in the Hope Baptist Church. It is much better, though it also is infected with Hollywood's notion of such scenes and with the more general notion of the Negroes as quaint, "touching," and funny. It does permit the Hall Johnson Choir to sing a few genuine spirituals with happy effect. The congregation also sings some compositions by Mr. Johnson which are, as they must be, rather dull and sentimental imitations of the real, bright thing.

Both Mr. Johnson and the director, Clarence Muse (he is definitely not one of the Muses), have labored for some time in the vineyard of Hollywood; and the combination of fake folk and Hollywood make of "Run Little Chillun" a tiresome and often embarrassing hodgepodge in which a promising situation is quite wasted—it is "solved" when the personable Sulamai is removed by lightning induced by the New Day Pilgrims—along with a good deal of talent and a great deal of money.

MUSIC

FOR many years I knew only Ravel's orchestral version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and took for granted that it must be more effective than the original work for piano—accepting too uncritically the prevailing idea that the orchestra did this sort of thing better than the piano. Then about seven years ago I heard Frank Sheridan play the original, and was amazed to discover that Mussorgsky achieved with the piano everything that Ravel achieved with the orchestra. After that I heard only Brailovsky's ineffective recorded performance; but a couple of weeks ago a friend played the work; and the impact of the experience was even stronger than it had been the first time.

An observation of Tovey on Schubert is relevant here: "Neither Shakespeare nor Schubert will ever be understood by any critic or artist who regards their weaknesses and inequalities as proof that they are artists of less than the highest rank. Even if a great artist can be 'written down by himself,' one work of art cannot be written down by another; and even if the artist produces no single work without flaws, yet the highest qualities attained in important parts of a great work are as indestructible by weaknesses elsewhere as if the weaknesses were the accidents of physical ruin." It doesn't matter how many poorer works Mussorgsky wrote; the composer of "Pictures at an Exhibition"—of the musical translations of "Goldenberg and Shmuyle," "Catacombs," "De Mortuis in Lingua Morta"—was a musical artist of the highest rank. That is evident not only in the imaginative impulse and insight, the conception of end and of means for the end, but in the actual execution of the conception: it doesn't matter where and when Mussorgsky was awkward and ineffective; in this work of his maturity—it is dated 1874 and is therefore of the same period as "Boris Godunov"—he writes at every point, in every detail of melody, harmony, figuration, with the unfaltering sureness of a man who is absolute master of his style.

But listening this time with sharpened awareness of Mussorgsky's achievement, I also became aware for the first time of what Ravel had achieved. I had always appreciated the insight and finesse of his orchestral translation of the work; what I realized now was the fact that in every detail it is the exact equivalent in orchestral terms of the piano original. I had thought the use of the saxophone for the melody of "The Old Castle" was the one exceptional instance of a desire to shock; but when the passage was played on the piano, there, to my amazement, was the timbre that called for the saxophone. I have no use for Ravel's qualities as a composer; but I have the deepest admiration and gratitude for the imaginative understanding and sympathy and the artistic rectitude that make his version of "Pictures at an Exhibition" unique among orchestral translations.

With increased appreciation of Mussorgsky's and Ravel's achievements came increased realization of the phonyness of Stokowski's statement accompanying his own orchestral version—his usual statement about merely having fulfilled what was implicit and only partly achieved in the original, which in this case he called a mere sketch for piano, and about having "aimed to preserve and express the Slavic character" that Ravel's "Gallic manner" had destroyed. If there were not the evidence of Stokowski's actual "fulfilment," which slashes out whole sections of the work and destroys the meaning and character of the rest with fussy and lush and lurid orchestral sonorities and effects, and if there were not the additional evidence of all his other performances, then his characterization of Mussorgsky's original work as a mere sketch and his reference to the "Gallic manner" of Ravel's translation would be enough to establish the fact that he is a "musician" without understanding of music—which is why he can make no other use of his gift for manipulating an orchestra than the equivalent of going into a museum and daubing gaudy paint over the Rembrandts, the Corots, the Cézannes. (Somebody once argued that Stokowski could not put any fever or melodrama into Bach or Mussorgsky that Bach or Mussorgsky had not put there first. In other words, since Bach and Mussorgsky had written the notes which Stokowski distorted, they were responsible for the effect which this distortion produced—which was like holding Shakespeare responsible for the effect of an actor's distortion of his lines.)

I should add that it is not only the orchestrators who commit such crimes. My friend played Mussorgsky's work from the edition of the original text published in Soviet Russia; but the clerk in the music-store had first offered him a re-arrangement of the work for piano by Harold Bauer, which, my friend said, defaced it as outrageously as Stokowski's orchestral horror.

Hearing the original piano version of "Pictures," finally, brought home to me more sharply the outstanding crime of this sort—Rimsky-Korsakov's revision of "Boris Godunov." For the assurance and mastery that I heard at every point in "Pictures" were the assurance and mastery with which Mussorgsky wrote at every point in "Boris," with only one difference: they extended to his writing for the piano in "Pictures," but not to his writing for the orchestra in "Boris." Not a note of the melody and harmony in "Boris" should have been changed, therefore; but the miscalculations in orchestration should have been corrected by someone as scrupulous as Ravel. Instead Rimsky-Korsakov changed not only the scoring but the melody, harmony, phraseology, and structure unscrupulously; and even in Soviet Russia, where Mussorgsky's original "Boris" was published and produced some years ago, the orchestration recently has been newly coarsened and vulgarized by Shostakovitch.

An Offer to Readers

Dear Sirs: The Breakdown of Internationalism by Irving Babbitt was published in two successive issues of The Nation in June, 1915. It occurred to me to reprint the essay in pamphlet form because of its timeliness, in spite of the fact that it was written twenty-eight years ago, and to make it available to all who are interested in the subject. And who is not?

If any of your readers, individually or in groups, care to know what the author of "Democracy and Leadership" thought about international affairs or foreign relations, I shall be glad to give them copies of the pamphlet for the asking. DORA D. BABBITT

News for the Services

Dear Sirs: For some time I have been disturbed by the fact that so many service men must form their opinion as to what is going on at home in a virtual vacuum of information or in an atmosphere of misinformation and half-truths gained from brief news broadcasts and mimeographed news sheets. The navy has recently taken some steps to meet the need for news of current affairs. These steps will do more good than harm, I think, but they need to be supplemented.

The editors of the Leatherneck, the magazine for and about the marines published in Washington, D. C., has announced that each of its subscribers will in the future receive a copy of the "pony" edition of Time. Query: who is absorbing the cost of these issues—the subscriber, Time, or taxpayers through use of public funds? I have also been notified recently that from now on my squadron will receive gratis 156 copies of Newsweek. We and other navy units are already receiving a few copies of the "pony" edition of Time free. Are public funds used for these periodicals or are the publishers being big-hearted?

I grant that these two magazines probably have wider appeal than any other two that could be selected. But if public funds are being used to provide them, or if scarce cargo space is used to transport them, then steps should be taken to see either that the news is fully and accurately reported in these publications or that publications such as yours, which carry the news that other publications suppress, are given distribution on equal terms. I like to read Time, Life, and Newsweek, but it seems to me that there is often a slanting of their news under the guise of a spurious objectivity. The ambitions of Henry Luce, the resentments of Raymond Moley, the underlying attitudes of Ralph Robey are such as to render the setup described very disquieting, to me at least.

There has already been some beefing about the broadcasting of the President's speeches to the armed forces. How about handing over a virtual monopoly to Henry Luce and Raymond Moley as far as the services are concerned? I write you all this in order that you may try to find out just what is up, if you are so inclined. I don't mean to imply that there is bad faith on the part of the navy officials responsible for this situation. They doubtless have acted on the basis of surveys which show that these magazines are the favorite news magazines of the men in the services.

FIRST LIEUTENANT, USMCR

What Are We Fighting For?

Dear Sirs: Many times I have been stirred to wrath by the fascist-reactionary groups in this country, but never before to the point where I have actually written a "letter-to-the-editor." However, this time I feel that mine is not a lone voice, for what I have to say is echoed by many service men. There must be thousands who feel the same way as I, for I am average-ordinary.

While in school I took an active part in the peace movements (1935-37), not because it was the thing to do but from a deep-rooted antipathy for war and a cynical attitude toward the last war and all the mess afterward.

With the rise of fascism I, along with others from both sides of the tracks, took a determined stand against fascism and flirted with communism. I say flirted, for we were never wholehearted in our support and in reality were only a socialist group that believed in the objectives of the New Deal. However, in our school we were considered analogous to the wildest bomb-throwing radicals.

For a long time I have found the viewpoint of The Nation and the New Republic to be very satisfactory—and still do.

However, this is the point. What are we fighting for? For the Washington Gestapo? For the treatment given General de Gaulle? For the race riots in Detroit and Texas? For the privilege of buying The Nation from the newsstands when one can get it (for I have been told it is not wise to have it come through the regular army mail channels)?

Everywhere I see the rising tide of reaction—ten potential Dieses for every Nation reader. I find (while on leave) that many Americans of French descent in New Orleans are in open sympathy with Vichy.

Sometimes I wonder just what in the hell I am fighting for, and at times I feel sick at heart.

Perhaps you can answer me—and others—in The Nation.

Poor Teachers: Poor Teaching

Dear Sirs: The letter from Ellsworth Barnard in the issue of July 3 is penetrating and provocative. He is correct in saying that poor teaching is primarily due to poor teachers, but he does not carry his analysis far enough to explain the unusually poor teaching which is all too common in the social studies. It is true, as Professor Barnard points out, that the less capable students turn to teaching as a career. Now my contribution is to point out that the least capable of this less capable group teach history and the other social studies. What can be done about it?

In the first place, the salaries of all teachers must be increased, a step which would almost automatically raise the level of competence within the whole profession. Second, teachers of all subjects, and especially those in the social studies, must be admitted to community citizenship; they must be socially and economically enfranchised. Third, protect the social studies by barring from the class rooms those who have had no training therein. The football coach, the bandmaster, and the home-economics teachers are not really prepared to teach American history. To allow them to do so is a mockery and a futility. The person who shies away from French, physics, and algebra will brazenly assume the responsibility of trying to teach civics and history. Certification laws in nearly every state need to be changed in order to prevent this desecration.

In educational matters Professor Barnard seems to be quite ungrounded. He refers to "education" courses as being the cause of poor teaching. Such courses require only one-seventh of the time of a four-year program, and education professors do not teach the "subjects" to prospective teachers; that is done by the professors in subject matter. For years I have been hunting for that man who believes "that education is primarily a matter of method." Professor Barnard surely knocked this straw creation flat, and with a mighty wallop. He refers to the terminology in education as "unintelligible jargon." When I stood on the street corner and heard two Greeks talking, I felt like saying, "What dumb jargon! I don't understand it." I did not yield to the impulse; Professor Barnard did.

For a Free World

Dear Sirs: "After this war, we'll have to fight Red Russia for the domination of Europe-America. After that, we'll have to fight Yellow Asia for the domination of the world." Such ominous predictions make table talk all over the country. Already we see emerging the frightful features of future wars.

Today this country—and the world—are torn between two factions. On one side, neo-isolationism, determined to emasculate every proposal for an effective and enduring peace; arrayed against it, and challenging it, the belief that effective democratic world organization can prevent future wars and give peace and justice to all nations and races. International anarchy versus international order—which shall prevail?

One thing is certain: mere wishing for the right cannot make it prevail. Another thing is certain: sporadic individual action is equally futile. As individuals we are like leaves in a hurricane.

Only organized mass action can enable us to prevail—organized action on a mass basis, on a nation-wide scale, under coordinated leadership. Only by such concerted action can we hope to exert pressure on obstructionists in Congress; uphold the hands of President Roosevelt, Henry Wallace, and the liberals in the State Department; and defeat neo-isolationism.

The American Free World Association requests you to enlist in such an organized, nation-wide campaign for world order and world peace. We are projecting local branches in every community in the country, mass letter-writing campaigns to key neo-isolationists in Congress, pressure campaigns against them in their own Congressional districts, and educational campaigns in every community.

The scales are so delicately balanced that your individual effort may help to decide the future. And your failure to act—now—tips the scales against us.

The Shape of Things

THE MARINES, SO TO SPEAK, HAVE LANDED in the State Department and the situation is well in hand. What passes for rebellion in the old gray headquarters of American diplomacy has been crushed. With Under Secretary Sumner Welles out of the way, Cordell Hull can now concentrate intensively on the shooting aspects of the war, which he holds to be the function of a Secretary of State in a moment of world-wide political upheaval. In his spare time he can work on reciprocal tariff schedules, secure in the knowledge that no subordinate will complicate his life with long-range plans which at least take notice of the profound changes now sweeping over the world. The Secretary's most ardent apologists have taken the tack that he has been unfairly blamed for bungling our foreign relations when those relations have in fact been conducted by the President. There is, we regretfully believe, something in the argument. But it leaves Mr. Hull and his aides with the curious defense that after all they don't count for much. With the new unanimity to be achieved by replacing Welles with a more tractable and less imaginative figure (otherwise why make the shift?) the Department presumably will count for still less. Here at home we may take this impotence for granted, but what about foreign statesmen who assume that the Department and its agents represent power, authority, and purpose? Confronted with removal of the Department's leading advocate of friendly relations with Russia and its most far-sighted internationalist, aren't they likely to suffer an increase of that "suspicion and confusion" which Mr. Hull wrathfully attributed to the inaccuracy of reporters?

THE PRESIDENT'S NEW LEND-LEASE REPORT contains three points of major political importance. The first, which is sure to stir a storm among petty minds and ungrateful hearts, is Mr. Roosevelt's statement that "victory and a secure peace are the only coin in which we can be repaid." It is too much to hope that the demagogues in Congress will remember that there can never be adequate repayment for the millions of Russian lives lost on the Eastern front, or for the heroic courage and constancy of the British people. In more than two years of lend-lease we have given all our allies the equivalent of just about two months' current war output. Who would play Shylock for so relatively small a contribution? The second point revolves around the question of food exports to our allies. The Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press has sought to make it appear that we are starving ourselves to feed our allies. This would be commendable and heroic, but it is not true. Actually, our contribution to our allies in terms of food is revealed to be far less, both relatively and absolutely, than in World War I. Finally, the report shows that at a time when the Russians were preparing for the third great Nazi offensive, and for what has turned out to be their own unexpectedly successful counter-offensive, lend-lease shipments to the Soviet fell steadily in value. A high of 233 millions of dollars reached in April was followed by 178 millions in May, and 139 millions in June, the lowest point since last October. Though the explanation for this is that the U. S. S. R. decided to take low-cost foodstuffs instead of high-cost arms, the real answer is that the meager amount of shipping allocated to the Russians forced them to make this choice.

LORD LOUIS MOUNTBATTEN'S APPOINTMENT as chief of the new Allied Southeast Asia Command operating from India and Ceylon is generally regarded as confirming the expectation of a drive against Burma at the end of the present monsoon season. Lord Louis, former head of the Commandos, is Britain's foremost specialist in combined land, sea, and air operations, and is therefore peculiarly qualified for the difficult and complex operations that will be required in Burma. Since an overland attack in force from India is out of the question because of the lack of roads, it is usually taken for granted that the Burma offensive will start with an amphibious attack on Rangoon, followed by a drive up the Irrawaddy valley. Even with the most careful preparations this is bound to be a difficult undertaking. In expectation of such a drive the Japanese are reported to be dispatching large numbers of troops and a considerable amount of supplies to the Rangoon area. It is possible that in order to avoid the hazards of a direct assault the Allied forces might first seize that part of Thailand which straddles the Malay peninsula, thus outflanking the Japanese position in Burma. But since a successful attack against any of these points presupposes overwhelming naval as well as air supremacy, it may be assumed that mopping up in the Mediterranean will be completed before the Burmese offensive opens.

THE AUSTRALIAN GENERAL ELECTION HAS resulted in a striking vote of confidence for Prime Minister John Curtin and his Labor government. In the previous Parliament membership was evenly divided between the Labor Party and the two chief opposition groups, the United Australia Party and the Country Party. The balance of power was held by two independents who normally supported Labor. Complete returns are not yet available but it is certain that Labor has won a safe majority and it may have as many as fifty-one seats out of seventy-five. It will also have a clear majority in the upper house when the newly elected senators take office next July. These results are all the more remarkable since the Australian system of preferential voting encourages independents and minorities, making it difficult for any party to attain a real majority unless the tide is running very strongly in its favor. Like General Smuts in South Africa, Mr. Curtin proved shrewd in his timing of the election. The tremendous improvement in the Pacific outlook as compared with a year ago certainly influenced the electorate. There is no doubt that the Labor government has backed General MacArthur stoutly, and both Curtin and his Minister of External Affairs, Herbert Evatt, have steered a skilful course in the tricky waters of United Nations diplomacy, keeping Australia's interests and the Pacific front well to the fore without raising British blood pressure too violently.

FINLAND, LIKE MANY OF THE OTHER AXIS satellites, has recently displayed an increasing desire to get out of the war on as good terms as possible. A rough idea of the kind of terms that the Finnish government is willing to discuss was conveyed last week to a British trade-union official by Eero Vuori, president of the Trade-Union Federation of Finland. All dreams of a "Greater Finland" appear to have been forgotten, and all that is now asked is somewhat more favorable terms than those of 1940 plus a Soviet forty-year guarantee of Finnish sovereignity. A few days before Vuori's visit, a group of fifty prominent Finns petitioned President Ryti to dismiss Premier Linkomies and replace him by former Premier Paasikivi, who is believed to be persona grata in Moscow. Some such political shift is obviously necessary before the Finns can hope to convince Russia, or anyone else, that their desire to get out of the war is serious. But even then, the new Finnish government would find itself in virtually the same position as the Badoglio government in Italy. It could not make peace without ejecting, or permitting the United Nations to eject, the German troops now on its soil. And Russia presumably would insist, as we must insist in Italy, on full military freedom for future operations against the Nazis. Unconditional surrender is as essential in the case of the satellites as it is for the major Axis powers. Finland's future boundaries, indeed its existence as an independent country, will inevitably depend on the success of the United Nations in forging a system of collective security which will assure Russia—and the rest of Europe—against aggression.

CLARENCE BUDINGTON KELLAND, EMINENT Republican and author of popular fiction, has been searching his soul and has made the great discovery that isolationism is passé. But his former myopia has not been replaced by far-sightedness; he forswears a shrinking nationalism only to proclaim a grasping imperialism. True, there is a slight flavor of internationalism about some of the five "zones of safety" for the United States which he has outlined. But he makes it quite clear that it is the fifth zone which really counts. This modest proposal calls for an "impregnable" America with a five-ocean navy and "an air force so numerous and efficient as to stand alone." In addition "we must possess, by friendly negotiation if we may, by occupation if we must . . . those bases which will perfect the fortifications of the United States." This means that "the Pacific Ocean must become an American lake" and that we must take over Casablanca and Dakar as well as permanent bases in Iceland and Greenland. Curiously enough, Mr. Kelland is able to couple with such ideas as these a proposal to set up a "trusteeship" for the conquered and "bankrupt" nations. Trustees who help themselves to the property they are appointed to conserve are not usually very highly regarded, and if Mr. Kelland's program is carried out we must expect to find America generally denounced as an aggressor nation, with other countries banding themselves together to seek security against our domination. Neither peace nor safety are to be found in this post-war variety of "America First."

WHILE THE COX COMMITTEE CARRIES ON ITS chairman's vendetta with the Federal Communications Commission, there is still no sign that Attorney General Biddle intends to act on evidence in his hands which shows that Representative Cox received $2,500 from a radio station with an application before the commission. It is a felony for a congressman to practice law before a Federal agency, but all the roles have been reversed in this case and Cox is prosecuting the FCC instead of the Attorney General prosecuting Cox. The FCC's latest crime seems to be that it tried to keep pro-Fascists off Italian foreign-language broadcasts in time of war. We find it hard to consider this a heinous offense. Chairman James L. Fly of the FCC points out in a letter to the New York Times that "after six months of 'investigation' and seven months of 'hearings,' the committee has still not afforded the commission an opportunity to answer any of the charges or to get a word in edgewise." Unfortunately too few seem to agree with Chairman Fly's declaration that "The Congressional power of investigation is too essential an instrument for maintaining the health of our body politic to permit it to be prostituted for personal vengeance." The Cox Committee "investigation" goes on.

Second-Class Ally

INSTEAD of being cool, vague, cagy, and unofficial, our relations with the French Committee of National Liberation are henceforth to be cool, vague, cagy, and official. This is the first major political achievement to emerge from the fateful talks at Quebec.

The Frenchmen who in four years have never relaxed in their fight against the Axis have no alternative now but to accept with humble thanks their allies' recognition of the committee's existence—however delayed, graceless, and qualified. But those of us who are not bound by the enervating niceties of diplomatic talk have a certain obligation to call a cipher a cipher.

Precisely what has been changed by the recognition formula which, with slight variations, has been announced by the United States, Britain, and Canada? The committee did not constitute a French government in exile before and it is not accepted as such a government now. The committee was not regarded as a trustee for French national interests before, and it is not so regarded now. The committee rated no seat at the council table of the United Nations before, and it rates no seat now. The de facto authority of the committee in French territories has now become an authority de jure. That is all.

It is too late to argue the validity of the Anglo-American position that fuller recognition would violate the rights of the French people; to point out, for instance, that the recognized government of Czechoslovakia is headed by a man who was teaching history in Chicago when the war broke out, whereas the French Committee is led by a high-ranking member of the last legitimate government of the French Republic; or that the recognized government of Poland has had no indorsement from the country it represents in London, whereas the French committee is the accepted authority of French territories with a population of 60,000,000, and has moreover been formally indorsed by the heads of every political party of France except Pétain's, by every labor union, and by every underground organization.

Except for the judgments of history, these arguments are water over the dam. What remains pertinent for the present and for the future are two clearly revealed facts. First, Britain and the United States have again given the Soviet Union an opportunity to take advantage of their diplomatic ineptitude. By recognizing the committee as "representative of the state interests of the French Republic," the Russians have pressed home the advantage, and if a future De Gaullist government of France proves friendlier to Russia than to us, only the Krocks and Lindleys will wonder why.

The second pertinent fact is that the British and American governments have made official what was only speculative before. When France is occupied by Allied troops, the committee will enjoy no jurisdiction on its native soil—not even pending an election. Instead, in the name of democracy, we shall subject France to military rule carried out in collaboration with whatever forces we consider expedient. These might include General Giraud's army, and if that isn't expedient enough we might choose to work with a Vichy officialdom which today has no inkling of the love for democracy that will sweep over it with the coming of our troops.

No Separate Peace

THE lack of a real understanding with Russia clouds the political horizon. Only two new facts have emerged since the end of the Quebec conference: the return to London of former Ambassador Ivan Maisky, perhaps to prepare a visit from Molotov; and the announced departure for Moscow of President Benes, who has finally secured the consent of the Allies to a Russian-Czechoslovakian pact.

If these are good omens, they are somehow counterbalanced by the icy silence with which Russia has greeted the Quebec communiqué and Roosevelt's speech in Ottawa, both published in the Soviet press without a word of comment. Only a meeting between Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin will constitute a real step forward, and then only if it results in an honest recognition that permanent collaboration between the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union is as indispensable to victory as to the establishment of a lasting peace.

It is not generally known that before the Quebec conference a general exchange of views on the military situation took place between the United States, Britain, and Russia. From all reports, the discussions were the most outspoken that have yet occurred between the staffs and diplomatic agencies of the three nations. The Anglo-American representatives are said to have credited the victories in North Africa and Sicily to extraordinary Allied superiority in men and material and to have told the Russians frankly that a similar superiority, capable of producing victory on the kind of front the Russians demand, can be achieved only in 1944. To draw off sixty German divisions from the eastern front and to tackle as well the forty divisions which Hitler holds as a central reserve would require, they calculated on the basis of the African and Sicilian experience, no less than 250 Allied divisions. Such a force will not be available until 1944. For the British and Americans that settles the question.

Of course, the Allies are preparing other fronts in various parts of Europe, though not precisely the kind of operation the Russians seek. In the discussions that preceded Quebec, the western Allies tried to convince the Soviet Union that the accomplishments of the last ten months had averted one great danger—the threat of a break-through by the Nazi armies in the interior of Russia. Sicily and the menace of invasion had already immobilized the "strategic reserve" which otherwise would have been thrown into the critical battle of Orel. The reduction of U-boat activities safeguarded the passage of as much war material as Russia might need in the near future. And the operations of the R. A. F. and the American Army Air Force engaged a large part of the Luftwaffe.

The Russians were not convinced. They insisted more bluntly than ever that a great opportunity had been lost last year at the time of the Battle of Stalingrad, and a still greater one this year, when combined action of the three great armies might have guaranteed victory in 1943. Moreover, they were extremely dissatisfied with the way the British and Americans were handling the political issues of the war with regard to the French, to Italy, and to Spain—without giving due consideration to Russian views. And behind everything the old Russian suspicions, to which we referred last week, continued to fester.

It is in the light of these differences that we must view the series of political events culminating in the recall of Ambassador Litvinov, which because of its timing must be regarded as a warning of political character.

Russia's first political stroke was the formation of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow in the middle of July. Elsewhere in this issue, Joachim Joesten presents an analysis of the committee's program and personnel. His information is enlightening. It would seem to us Russia had two motives in forming the committee. The first was to establish a front within Germany in order to wage real political war against nazism. For that purpose the formula of unconditional surrender is too rigid. It leaves no margin for an intelligent political strategy, while the Russian move, on the other hand, opens a hopeful door to the German people. In the second place, and only in the second place, the formation of the committee gave the Russians a trump card to bid against the Allied powers.

We do not believe that Russia is playing with the idea of a seperate peace, or that it has done so at any time since the German attack. But if we abandon the Russians to the kind of war they have been waging for the last two years, entailing fantastic losses, colossal destruction, and an increasingly grave food situation, they may be obliged to reconsider their future course of action. Should they do so, however, it would not be necessary for them to accept the tragic consequences of a separate peace, won at the cost of six million Russian dead. They could do something else. They could imitate British and American military behavior in the past eighteen months. They could say, at the moment when their armies have reconquered the most important part of the Ukraine, that they need time to reorganize before going ahead, and that they will wait for the Allies to enter the war with their full weight. That would mean, not a separate peace but a kind of military stalemate, full of danger for the common cause of the United Nations.

Britain's Fifth Year

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

London, August 26, by Cable

THE fourth anniversary of the start of the war finds Britain stronger than it was in 1939. That is something Hitler cannot say about his nation. The war is actually here as an established part of life. Since the end of the Blitz it has even come to have its compensations as well as its sorrows and heavy burdens. You feel as you talk to people and watch them at work that the country could if necessary go on producing and fighting indefinitely.

Everybody says the people are tired. Certainly they have a right to be, for they are working, as they have worked since Dunkirk, at a steady, heavy pace. But they show their weariness very little. In the war plants they tackle their jobs with apparent energy, though the work day is long. The workers seem matter of fact and have little of the skeptical what's-it-all-about attitude you often meet at home. This is not only a product of British temperament; it springs also from a living realization on the part of every individual that this island escaped invasion and defeat by something like a miracle—a miracle compounded of Hitler's error in calculation and Britain's upsurge of resolve and effort. People refer to that period, and particularly to the Blitz itself, as if it were a cherished possession of the nation, a source of lasting pride and power. One thing is certain: the terrible durability of this people is a greater war asset than all the conquests of the Nazis.

But when this has been set down for the record some other things remain to be said. Britain is not a nation of robots. The unity is real; as in no other country the people have acquired habits of cooperation on a level so nearly unconscious that they might be called instinctive. But even while the war goes on, political and social forces are at work breaking up old patterns and creating new ones. British unity not only allows for differences; it would not exist if differences were not permitted expression. Today issues that remained submerged during the earlier part of the war are bubbling to the surface. The row over the affiliation of public-service unions with the Trade Unions Congress, still unsettled as I write, is a case in point. The long pending question of equal pay for women is being raised simultaneously in several parts of the country. I stumbled into it just the other day in the course of a visit to a great mass-production airplane-engine plant. A demand for the same rates for identical work had recently been made by the shop stewards. The management had resisted any change and a strike was threatened. Finally the dispute was submitted to a tribunal, which still has it under advisement. But in the course of the negotiations the workers' representatives themselves divided over the strike issue. Some of the shop stewards in the plant are Communists and they of course were instructed to oppose a strike. But the left sentiments of several were strong enough to outweigh their party loyalty and they actually resigned from the party in order to free their hands for action.

This situation illustrates the sort of differences that are beginning to emerge. All down the line you find evidence of impatience with a status quo which has given labor security and jobs but has robbed it of freedom to act. When the war ends the worker will want his freedom back and will demand security and a job as well. Personally I believe this is about all he wants, but it may be a more revolutionary desire than it sounds. The prospect of his getting it without a fight both in the plant and at the polls is not bright. Even the most reactionary British industrialists are on the average far more enlightened than their American counterparts; they realize more clearly the consequences which would follow a collapse of production after the war. But unless government controls are applied on a scale which in peace-time would look suspiciously like socialism, such a collapse would seem inevitable. In any case, workers with whom I have talked regard the future warily. They trust neither the government nor the employers, and they are waiting to see what their own leaders will do when the truce ends. There is more skepticism than militancy in their attitude, but militancy could easily arise out of disappointed hopes.

Among all sorts of people I find deep concern about post-war prospects in general. Everybody asks me about America's position. Will we "pull out," as we did last time? The antics of the isolationist and Pacific-first elements are followed with anxiety. Will we set out to capture world markets while Britain is still struggling with problems of reconstruction, or will we come to some agreement for the international control of trade? The genial idiocies of Eric Johnston have aroused widespread comment and private dismay in business as in other circles. And finally, what on earth is the explanation of our foreign policy and what sort of Europe are we hoping to create? This last question is more frequently put to me than either of the others, especially, but not by any means exclusively, by people of left or liberal sympathies. To a degree unknown in the United States the common man here looks upon his country's struggle as part of a universal integrated war, which includes not only every fighting front today but all the lost battles of yesterday. Spain and Austria are in his mind as well as Dunkirk.

The President's firm reputation in this country as the "undaunted champion of the rights of free man and the mighty leader of the forces of freedom," to quote Mackenzie King, makes our policy toward France and Italy and Spain and our apparent willingness to alienate Russia "incomprehensible" to most Britons. In their own government they see divergent tendencies. They may accuse the Prime Minister of an undue desire to please the President and an undue reluctance to grapple with the political aspects of the war, but they also see contrary motives at work, such as produced the timely intervention of Mr. Eden last spring. In America's foreign policy they see only bewildering inconsistency. This attitude has been expressed to me by all sorts of people, from important government officials to shipyard workers on the Clyde. They know they can defeat Hitler and they expect to do it before the fifth year of war is ended. But it is quite another thing to defeat the forces that threaten to rob victory of its meaning, especially when they find among them leaders upon whom they had counted as their strongest allies.

The President and Sumner Welles

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, August 27

THE grudging, cold, and ambiguous form in which we have finally recognized the French Committee of National Liberation places the affair of Sumner Welles in a new light. There is little doubt that the President would hardly have asked the resignation of so close a friend as the Under Secretary unless he had been under strong pressure to do so. Secretary Hull's implied denial that he had threatened to resign unless Welles was removed is probably true, though the truth is of that disingenuous and split-hair variety so beloved of cracker-barrel sophists and experienced diplomats. The threat was made for Hull by Senator Connally and "Assistant President" Byrnes, and the President may have felt that he had no choice but to sacrifice Welles as he had earlier sacrificed Moley. The appalling question raised by the way in which we have recognized the French Committee is whether the President himself, considering the trend of his foreign policy, will not feel more comfortable with Welles out of the way.

The fact is that on French policy, Roosevelt, Hull, and Leahy decline to recognize the true state of affairs despite what their own men in the field and their more capable subordinates at home have been telling them. From North Africa, Robert Murphy—yes, Murphy—has been bombarding the State Department with cables recommending in ever stronger terms that we grant full recognition to the French National Committee. This represents a change in Murphy's original point of view, a change inescapable for any man actually in the field, as proven by the fact that every other State Department representative abroad whose work touches at all on French affairs agrees with Murphy.

A count of heads in the State Department itself would show a majority for full recognition. I don't know whether Berle is still up in his metaphysical clouds talking of a mysterious "Third France" which he says is for neither Pétain nor De Gaulle; that was his line some months ago. I feel sure that Assistant Secretary of State Breckinridge Long and Political Adviser James Clement Dunn do not disagree with Hull. But I have learned from several informed sources that Welles, Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and most of the younger men in the department have felt for weeks that we were making a mistake in not granting recognition, genuine recognition, to the French Committee. And the real obstacle has not been the wavering Hull and his departmental sycophants so much as the White House. President Roosevelt is deeply prejudiced against De Gaulle and Leahy continues to think of Pétain as an old friend. I believe, and I have more than my own hunch to go upon, that both expect to make another deal with Pétain when our troops enter France.

There is a more important aspect to this affair of the French Committee of National Liberation. The President, as a compromise with Hull (Mr. Roosevelt, it now appears, hates to fire anybody but a real progressive), has wanted to keep Welles on in a kind of roving ambassadorship, especially to deal with the Soviet Union. The Russians, who were very suspicious of Welles for telling them before June 22 that Hitler would attack, have come to take a more appreciative attitude toward him since. Welles is no radical; he is only occasionally liberal. His outlook is about that of a sensible business man who prefers a shrewd adjustment to realities to butting his head against a stone wall. Against the background of the State Department, this has made Welles appear extraordinarily competent and contemporary.

Of all our professional diplomats, except Davies, Welles is the one who would be most welcome at Moscow. But Welles is said to fear that his efforts there would be abortive. If Hull and his men could politically cut Welles's throat while he was in Washington, what couldn't they do to him while he was away in Moscow? How much could he accomplish against the 1919-capitalist mentality of Hull and the pro-Franco and anti-

Soviet prejudices of Dunn, who now emerges as the most powerful office politician in the department?

To these questions the form in which we have recognized the French National Committee adds another, even more serious. How far could Welles count on understanding and support from Roosevelt himself? The American statement on the committee is more than inept. Its evasiveness, plus the fact that there were separate statements from the three great powers and that the Soviets gave the committee full recognition "as representative of the state interests of the French Republic," does not speak well for Roosevelt's political acumen.

If the President cannot do a better job of diplomacy than this on so limited a question as the French Committee, what hope is there on the major issues of the coming peace? The rift between the Soviet Union and the Anglo-American powers has been widened, and widened unnecessarily. For events in North Africa have shown that the Committee of National Liberation is strong enough to have its way despite Washington and London, and the Soviet statement, though forthright, admirably takes care of the "constitutional" anxieties evinced by the State Department pundits. Moscow does not recognize the committee as a "provisional" government. Sound policy would have won French gratitude by granting what the committee will obtain in any case, and maintained a united front of the three powers. As it is, even the Latin American countries are following Russia, and Russia by sheer political good sense and realism has emerged to take world diplomatic leadership on a basic question not only for the French but for the people of all the occupied countries.

I am reluctantly compelled to believe that the retirement of Welles as Under Secretary is more than the product of political blackmail by Hull and the Southern bloc. It fits too well into the pattern of the President's steady drift toward the right. The result, especially if Breckinridge Long becomes Under Secretary and Dunn Assistant Secretary, will be further to unfit our already antiquated State Department for the great diplomatic tasks ahead. Welles is Roosevelt's friend; but so is Dunn. On Spanish policy, Welles and Roosevelt were pro-Loyalist in thought, but in action Roosevelt took his stand with the pro-Franco clique led by Dunn. The bond between that clique and the White House is the orientation toward the Vatican in European affairs which seems to be a permanent feature of Roosevelt's foreign policy, albeit largely for domestic political reasons. We may be sure that Moscow will read these signs less hesitantly than we old pro-Rooseveltians.

Stalin's New Germany

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

RUSSIA'S absence from the Quebec conference, the growing impatience of the Soviet press over the delay in opening a second front in Western Europe, the continuing Polish-Soviet dispute, the formation of a Free Germany Committee in Moscow on July 12, and now, on top of everything else, Litvinov's replacement at Washington (a few weeks after Maisky's recall from London) are all ominous signs of Russian displeasure with the Western Allies.

In London and Washington each of these moves has been received with pained surprise mingled with irritation. The trouble with most of our statesmen is that they underestimate the bold imagination which inspires Stalin's foreign policy. They do not appreciate the peculiar sense of humor which prompts the Soviet Premier to confound his friends as well as his enemies—especially if he questions the extent of their good faith.

The full import of the Free Germany Committee has not yet, I believe, been realized in this country. There has been widespread wonder and speculation, but most of the conjectures advanced are wide of the mark. For instance, the fact that the committee is sponsored and apparently bossed by a number of old Communist wheelhorses has been widely interpreted as signifying that it is just another product of the nominally disbanded Comintern. Nothing could be more misleading. A study of the committee's personnel and program leads to the conclusion that, politically, it is not a Communist outfit and that it is not intended to provoke a proletarian revolution in Germany. It is, on the contrary, a horselaugh directed at our Bolshevist-bogy peddlers. The specter that haunts these little souls is purely imaginary, whereas they are blind to the real danger that faces them.

Stalin is much too smart to plan for a Soviet Germany because he is fully aware that such a Germany would eventually dominate Russia. The Germans, with their extraordinary talent for organization, their resources, and their central position in Europe, would soon get the upper hand, and within a few years the center of gravity would shift from Moscow to Berlin. Soviet Russia would become an annex of Soviet Germany. This is not what the Russian nationalist Stalin has tenaciously worked and fought for. His purposes would be much better served by a Germany that was neither Communist nor Fascist; a Germany that was different from, but friendly toward, the Soviet Union.

The formation of the Free Germany Committee may well constitute an underhand Russian bid for a separate peace and a subsequent alliance with Germany. But this would not be the kind of alliance between revolutionary states that failed so conspicuously in the years after the last war; it would be an alliance between a socialist but nationalist Russia and a democratic but nationalist Germany.

In analyzing the program and the composition of the German committee in Moscow, we must start from the evident premise that no political manifestation is possible in Russia today that does not have the backing of the Soviet government. The Free Germany group in Moscow is not only tolerated by the Soviet government but has been given the widest possible publicity. First Pravda and then all other major Soviet newspapers played up the story of its formation as a world event of the first magnitude. Some issues of Freies Deutschland, the committee's German-language paper, comprised millions of copies, although there is an acute newsprint shortage in the U. S. S. R. Hence we are fully justified in believing that the program of the Free Germans in Moscow tells us exactly what Stalin intends to do about Germany.

What is this program? It is certainly not inspired by a demand for unconditional surrender. It is an attempt to save Germany from dismemberment and destruction. And not only Germany but its army too—the same army that is now at death grips with the forces of the Soviet! The manifesto published by the committee on July 21 is explicit:

> The troops of England and America are at the gates of Europe. . . . The hour of collapse is approaching . . . but Germany must not die! To be or not to be—such is the question today facing our country. . . . The German people need immediate peace and long for it, but nobody will conclude peace with Hitler. . . . Hence the formation of a genuine national German government is the most urgent task of our people. . . . This government . . . will be supported by the fighting groups that will unite to overthrow Hitler. There are forces in the army that are loyal to the country, and the people must play a decisive role [my italics].

What kind of government do the Free Germans want? The manifesto supplies the answer: "A strong, democratic power that will have nothing in common with the helpless Weimar régime. . . . This government will immediately cease military operations, recall German troops to the Reich's frontiers, and embark on peace negotiations, renouncing all conquests. In this manner it will attain peace and once again place Germany on an equal footing with other nations."

The most noteworthy feature of this manifesto is that it nowhere so much as hints at the establishment of a Soviet régime in Germany. It repeatedly calls for a democratic government, explicitly recognizes the right to lawfully acquired property, and pictures a Germany peaceful, cooperative, progressive. There would be no reason whatever for alarm except for one factor: the committee is clearly committed to salvaging the German army. It is indeed a remarkable performance for old Communist Party whips like Walter Ulbricht, Erwin Hoernle, Wilhelm Florin, and the former secretary of the Comintern, Wilhelm Pieck, to affix their signatures to a manifesto that calls on German soldiers not to turn their rifles against their own officers, but to "hold on to them under the leadership of those commanders who recognize their responsibility, . . . boldly clearing the path that will lead your country to peace."

Later declarations of the committee go even further in their repudiation of the revolutionary ways of 1918. In a recent issue of Freies Deutschland, Major Herbert Soesslein, a leading member of the. committee, wrote: "We are opposed to fomenting demoralization in the Wehrmacht. We do not intend to incite the soldiers to abandon their arms and retreat in disorder. . . . We must avert at all costs any repetition of the events of 1918. We must avoid all anarchy and undisciplined behavior. . . . Our slogan is reconstruction, not destruction."

In the same article, Major Soesslein describes the German army—which the Western democracies have vowed to destroy so utterly that it will never rise again!—as "a valuable instrument which must be preserved at any cost and in full," and he claims that "construction of a strong democracy will require the support of a strongly welded army led by officers who realize their responsibilities."

The Moscow dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor from which these citations are taken provides another, most revealing, side light on the character of the Free Germany Committee. Its organ, Freies Deutschland, carries on its masthead a German flag. Not the red banner of Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg; not the black, red, and gold flag of the Weimar Republic; no—the red, white, and black of Imperial Germany, the beloved symbol of Alfred Hugenberg, the Stahlhelm, the Reichswehr, and the Junkers!

Now let us have a look at the membership of the Free Germany Committee. It certainly is the most strangely assorted company that I have ever seen banded together for a common political purpose. Of the thirty-four signers of the July manifesto, twelve are exiled members of the German Communist Party. Of these twelve, five were Reichstag deputies—Pieck, Ulbricht, Florin, Hoernle, and Martha Arendsee—and four are well-known writers and poets—Johannes R. Becher, Willi Bredel, Friedrich Wolf, and Erich Weinert, the last named being chairman of the executive committee. All the others are prisoners of war, half of them officers. The group includes three majors and two captains, and two of the officers were university professors before they were pressed into uniform.

Among the captive officers, two names stand out: those of Count Heinrich von Einsiedel, member of one of Germany's oldest aristocratic families and a great-grandson of Bismarck, and Bernt von Kügelgen, son of the well-known editor and publisher Paul Siegwart Konstantin von Kügelgen, who for many years owned the Saint Petersburg Zeitung. He too is a typical German Junker.

Even before the Free Germany Committee was launched, the Russians printed and showered over the German lines thousands of leaflets bearing a picture of Count von Einsiedel in the Luftwaffe uniform in which he was shot down near Stalingrad in August, 1942. The picture shows Einsiedel holding in his hands a poster on which a towering, masterful Bismarck sternly and contemptuously points at a little Hitler in the lower right-hand corner, with the legend, "This man is leading Germany toward catastrophe." The leaflet represents Einsiedel as saying: "A war of Germany against Russia is stupid and without chance [of success]. This my great-grandfather, Otto von Bismarck, said again and again, and every soldier must daily become more convinced of its truth." This Bismarckian touch is perhaps the most interesting feature about Moscow's Free Germany movement. The Russians evidently are pursuing a Rückversicherungspolitik of their own, and it is not difficult to guess against whom they are thus reinsuring themselves.

The almost inescapable conclusion is that through the Free Germany Committee Stalin is stretching out a hand toward Germany, not of course the Germany of Adolf Hitler, which he has vowed to destroy, but a new, chastised Germany that will be the Soviet Union's ally. Together the two nations would form the greatest Continental power in history. It is particularly worthy of note how closely the program of the Free Germans follows the policy which Stalin laid down months before the Casablanca Conference. In his historic address to the Moscow Soviet last November, Stalin said:

> It is not our aim to destroy Germany, for it is impossible to destroy Germany, . . . but the Hitlerite state can and should be destroyed, and our first task, in fact, is to destroy the Hitlerite state and its inspirers. . . . It is not our aim to destroy all military forces in Germany, for every literate person will understand that this is not only impossible, . . . but it is also inadvisable from the point of view of the future. But Hitler's army can and should be destroyed. . . . Our second task is, in fact, to destroy Hitler's army and its leaders. . . . Our third task is to destroy the hated New Order in Europe and to punish its builders.

In the same address, it will be remembered, Stalin drew up the program of the Anglo-Soviet-American coalition:

> Abolition of racial exclusiveness, equality of nations and integrity of their territories, liberation of enslaved nations and restoration of their sovereign rights, the right of every nation to arrange its affairs as it wishes, economic aid of nations that have suffered and assistance to them in attaining their material welfare, restoration of democratic liberties, the destruction of the Hitlerite régime.

Coming eight months after Stalin's speech, the manifesto of the Free Germany Committee stresses once more the extraordinary consistency and tenacity of Soviet foreign policy. There is nothing mysterious or enigmatic about it; the mystery and the enigma are all on the other side. Stalin does not want the Anglo-Saxon powers to control the destiny of post-war Europe. He will have no Amgots north of the Brenner Pass. He is not sacrificing the flower of Russian manhood to see Hitler's Europe replaced by a hostile combination led by such characters as Franco, Mannerheim, Giraud, Badoglio, and Otto von Hapsburg. If there is to be a cordon sanitaire, he wants it to face the other way.

The Allies have only themselves to thank for the storm that is now brewing in Eastern Europe. Instead of offering the subjugated nations unconditional freedom under democratic leadership, they are playing Metternich's game of restoration with old men, old ideas, and old frontiers. How can they expect to arouse enthusiasm?

Stalin, shrewd and masterful as ever, is now cashing in on the shortcomings of his allies. His active, assertive policy—characterized by such moves as the Free Germany Committee, his forthcoming alliance with Czechoslovakia, and the formation of the new Polish army under Major General Zigmund Berling—will win him many new friends in a disillusioned Europe. The program set forth by that committee will appeal not only to anti-Nazi, nationalistic Germans who would rather sell their souls to the devil than surrender unconditionally, but to countless other Europeans as well. It is about time the Allies thought up something more attractive for Germany than unconditional surrender plus a Darlan or Badoglio.

There may yet be time to avert a swing in Soviet policy away from the Allies and toward a Bismarckian Germany. But not much time. It was hardly by chance that immediately after the announcement of Litvinov's recall the Soviet Embassy in Washington emphatically posed the question of Russia's role in post-war Europe. This is the gist of the matter. The Soviet Union wants its allies to recognize, here and now, its frontiers of 1941 and to repudiate all plans for a cordon sanitaire. If a satisfactory settlement of Russia's demands can be reached quickly, Bismarck's ghost may yet be laid to rest. If not, our only hope of staving off a separate peace between Russia and Germany, followed by an alliance between them, would seem to lie in Heinrich Himmler's ability to keep the German generals from taking Stalin's outstretched hand.

Financing America's Future

I. BEHIND THE DOLLARS[*]

BY STUART CHASE

IN 1925, Russia had been through a devastating war and a violent internal revolution. Its currency had been destroyed in a runaway price inflation, it was the world's worst financial risk abroad, and it had very little gold. Yet by the end of the first Five-Year Plan in 1933, Russia had invested some 60 billion rubles in factories, new cities, hydroelectric developments, armaments, houses, schools. There stood the new plant, ugly and solid. Without it Russia could never have met the onslaught of Hitler's armies. Where did the money come from?

In 1933 it was freely prophesied that Italy could not invade Ethiopia. It had no credit abroad and almost no gold. The effort would bankrupt it. Italy went ahead, conquered Ethiopia, and emerged without financial collapse. Where did the money come from?

Hitler took over a German state which was literally bankrupt. It had defaulted on its foreign obligations. When he proposed to build a powerful army, together with all kinds of grandiose public works, he was laughed at in London and New York. Germany was insolvent, and the whole idea was preposterous. The nations of Europe which have trembled under the thunder of Panzer divisions know that Hitler built even more terribly than he promised. Where did the money come from?

When Japan began to rattle its sword in the direction of Indo-China and challenge the United States and the British Empire, wiseacres said it was a bluff. The long years of the war in China had reduced the Japanese economy to a bag of bones. It was bankrupt and could not sustain a real fight. Yet it opened a new attack with devastating fury, and with military equipment—in planes, tanks, artillery, ships—that was as excellent as it was unexpected. Where did the money come from?

In 1939, the United States Congress declined to appropriate $4 billion for highways, conservation, hospitals, freight cars, in the bitterly contested "lend-spend" bill. It was widely held that the bill would lead to ruin and national bankruptcy. Yet since the fall of France in 1940, Congress has appropriated almost $300 billions for armaments—75 times as much as the "lend-spend" bill—and a large fraction of it has already gone into tanks and guns. Far from being ruined, our national vitality has never been more evident, and great financial moguls assure us that we shall be able to swing the national debt. Where did the money come from?

After the war America will need to maintain full employment, operate its industries at substantial capacity, provide the essentials of life for all its own citizens, and help foreign peoples who are starving and unable to pay for the supplies. There will be a towering political demand for a world delivered from chronic depression. Where will the money come from?

It is clear from these examples that what a great nation can "afford" in periods of crisis depends not on its money but on its man-power and its goods. Russia, Italy, Germany, Japan, the United States, all used money in the situations mentioned, but money was obviously not the dominant factor. Man-power and materials were the dominant factor. Yet at other times, when crisis was not so acute, the money for necessary tasks could not be found. Unemployment, insecurity, want dragged on. This is a puzzling paradox. At certain times a nation can afford what at other times, with no less money, it cannot afford. At certain times we are afraid of national bankruptcy, and at other times we give it hardly a thought.

Is there any way to smooth these ups and downs; any way to balance the things we can afford in terms of money with the things we can afford in man-power and materials? The methods used in total war produce results, but they are pretty rough ones, even in non-Axis nations. Can more gentle techniques be devised for peace time which will also produce results?

THE DISASTER ECONOMY

Adolf Berle tells of walking through a tenement district in New York with a friend a few years ago. What they see depresses them. They want to clean it up. But the moment they begin to think of ways to abolish slums, all kinds of difficulties loom across the path—the high cost of land, the difficulty of getting materials, exorbitant rates of interest, graft and corruption in the building trades, the avarice of landlords, the general apathy of everybody. As they walk along, listing the difficulties, any idea of improvement grows more and more remote.

But wouldn't a good, rousing earthquake solve everything? It would not only open up the ground; it would open up people's minds. But then, of course, the death and disruption must be thrown on the scales. The disaster would generate action, bold and immediate. The slums would be abolished once and for all. "Is it too much to ask," queries Mr. Berle, "that the driving quality which can be called forth by a great cataclysm might be made available for continuous and steady action? Is it necessary that some scourge of God, driving by brute fear, shall create a common will?"

[*] Based on a chapter from the author's forthcoming report to the Twentieth Century Fund, to be published in the fall under the title, "Where's the Money Coming From? Problems of Post-War Finance."

We recall the story of the man who was apprehended for going along the street smashing windows. He defended himself by saying it was good for trade. So it was—even if not for the owners of the buildings. If unemployment is rife, smashing windows, plowing under cotton, pouring milk into ditches are all good—for trade. Even better is a raging flood or a devastating hurricane.

For some years the potential output of the power age has tended to exceed the available cash in the hands of consumers. Gradually we have come to live in what might be called a "disaster economy," where waste and loss stimulate trade, where thrift and good quality depress it. Many examples come to mind. Advertising pressure has encouraged us to throw things away and get a new model. The Ohio floods of 1937 brought unemployment, death and destruction, and a flash of prosperity to the valley as relief money came pouring in, and some of those thrown out of work got jobs in rescue and reconstruction work. The New England hurricane of 1938 killed hundreds and robbed thousands of their homes and jobs, but it also created a temporary labor shortage in the building trade, and shot the price of candles up to fifty cents apiece. The original AAA program was designed to boost prices by destroying crops. Long before the Triple A, a statue was erected to the boll weevil, one of the best things for trade that ever hit the cotton belt.

But the best thing of all for trade is war. In the United States alone, the war has already provided an 80-billion-dollar annual market. This terrific demand is running us into a man-power shortage in jig time. There are more orders on the books than there are men to fill them. Women, boys, old men are being hauled in, but it looks now as if only a drastic conscription of labor can ease the shortage. True, many small businesses are falling by the wayside, but full employment and full-blast production are here at last. The only trouble is the costs involved —death on a dozen battlefronts abroad, a 25-per-cent increase in prices, government controls, and Spartan living at home. If we could have the advantages of full employment without these costs, Utopia would be here at last.

THE BLIGHT OF ABUNDANCE

H. G. Wells, in "The Shape of Things to Come," has well summarized the situation in which abundance became a curse and destruction a blessing to trade:

> The war [1914-1918] from the economic point of view had been the convulsive using up of an excess of production that the race had no other method of distributing and consuming. . . . The post-war increase in war production, which went on in spite of endless palavering about disarmament, did not destroy men, nor scrap and destroy material, in sufficient quantity to relieve the situation. . . . The more efficient the output, the fewer the wage-earners. The more stuff there was, the fewer consumers there were. . . . This was the paradox of overproduction which so troubled the writers and journalists of the third decade of the twentieth century.

I don't believe that anybody likes this as a system, whatever temporary personal benefits glass dealers may get out of smashed windows. It violates a deep human instinct. It makes a mockery of the principle of "least work." Costs and sacrifices are prodigious. While the efficiency engineers save a few drops at the spigot, a torrent is rushing out of the bunghole. What is the use of making two blades grow where one grew before when the sacrifices are too great or the whole crop may be burned or abandoned? An economy that relies for its stimulation on waste and disaster is taking the road to oblivion as surely as the dinosaurs, those creatures that were all bulk and no brains.

The so-called people's revolution springs, I believe, from this paradox. The wayfaring man in every country is sick of starving in the midst of plenty. The Germans' toleration of Hitler was due to their blind hope that he could stop it. Even war may seem preferable to rotting on the dole.

In 1931 the League of Nations reported thirty million unemployed in Europe and America. Trade, in fact, was bad. What would be good for it? The most practical window-smashing device was spending for armaments. Spending for welfare projects ran into difficulties, as Mr. Berle noted, because such projects, it was feared, would not "pay out." But nobody expects tanks to pay out in money terms. Therefore the opposition to armament building in Europe was relatively mild. The tanks were built with the labor of the unemployed. The vast rearmament program of Europe in the late 1930's did in fact end the depression, but it filled Europe with guns pointing over every frontier.

WHEN PRODUCTION OUTRUNS CONSUMPTION

One can begin to discover a rough cycle in the performance of the modern economy, where mass production outruns mass consumption. Machines grind and produce a mountain of goods. The goods pile up and presently choke the machines. The machines go on half time or stop altogether. The plethora of goods must be dynamited out of the way so that the machines can start again, and their human tenders can work again. Only total war has so far provided the requisite amount of dynamite. But total war demands bigger and better machines and a huge increase in capacity in those industries that can make munitions and matériel, while the destruction of capital goes on apace, and many civilian industries cannot keep up their repairs and replacements. Only another war can relieve the pressure. . . . And so on from catastrophe to catastrophe.

Winston Churchill, in his book, "The World Crisis," vividly illustrates our point. He is speaking of the last Armistice Day, November 11, 1918:

> A requisition for half a million houses would not have seemed more difficult to comply with than those we were already in process of executing for 100,000 aeroplanes, or 20,000 guns, or 2,000,000 tons of projectiles. But a new set of conditions began to rule from eleven o'clock onward. The money cost, which had never been considered by us to be a factor capable of limiting the supply of the armies, asserted a claim to priority from the moment the fighting stopped.

Instantly the problem of productive capacity and manpower in excess of demand began to make itself felt. The "money cost" became a brake on the whole economic machine. A world "fit for heroes to live in" presently degenerated into a world of unemployment, doles, and despair, the terrible world of J. B. Priestley's "English Journey."

I have in my files pictures of veritable mountains of oranges, potatoes, coffee, marked for destruction. Nearly every farm crop has been plagued by surpluses since the last war. The great extension of wheat capacity from 1915 to 1919 produced not only ruinous post-war prices but the dust bowl, where nature took a hand in helping trade by disaster. In the case of factories, the problem of surplus is present in the form of excess capacity, but mountains of unsold goods cannot often be photographed. A factory can close down faster than a growing crop.

If this is the sequence—I admit that it is a very rough description—what is the way to stop it? One obvious way would be to channel off the goods so promptly that they could not pile up to choke the machines. Indeed, short of war and disaster, is there any other way to make trade good? In simplest terms, this is the post-war economic problem. The channels for moving the goods are primarily financial, and the dams across the channels are financial—the "money costs," as Winston Churchill called them. They deserve the most cold and objective analysis, if we are to avoid the fate of the dinosaurs. What we need is the knowledge and the courage to organize our economy for full employment at a lower social cost. We shall never have full employment without effort, but we can surely have it without war and disaster and their toll of destruction, loss of freedom, and human lives.

MR. KIPLING'S latest volume, "Many Inventions," sustains his reputation as an excellent story-teller. . . . This lack of judgment or of self-control renders Mr. Kipling ineffective and unconvincing as a serious critic of life.—September 14, 1893.

A PROPOSITION well worth considering is that introduced in the House last week providing for the annexation of the Territory of Utah to the state of Nevada. The present condition of Nevada is a reproach to our system of government. . . . Its population has been dwindling for years, and had sunk as low as 45,761 souls in 1890. Utah, on the other hand, is growing steadily and rapidly. . . . The time is rapidly approaching when Utah must cease to be a Territory, and there could be no better way of its gaining the advantages of statehood than through a union with Nevada.—September 21, 1893.

VIRGINIA and half of the states in the Union combined show no more cities of over 20,000 inhabitants than are to be found in Massachusetts. . . . THERE IS something very startling in the increase of that form of lawlessness known as lynching in the South. It has three distinguishing features: (1) the victims are always Negroes; (2) the murderers are never punished; (3) simple murder often fails to satisfy the lynching parties, and they resort to torture and such forms of mutilation as would be expected only of our most savage Indians.—September 21, 1893.

THE PASSAGE of the Irish Home Rule Bill in the British House of Commons and its defeat in the Lords leave English politics and society in an extremely interesting condition for the foreign observer. None of their phenomena is queerer than the hatred of Gladstone among the upper and upper middle classes. . . . Frantic desire for his death is openly uttered. That "G. O. M." ["Grand Old Man"] stands for "God's Only Mistake" is one of the grim jokes of the Conservative clubs, and old ladies will avow their willingness to walk miles with peas in their shoes to see him hanged.—September 28, 1893.

The Red Army's Offensive

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

SHOULD the Quebec conference have the effect of transferring major American interest to the Pacific, the Allies will have missed their chance for an early defeat of Hitler. Now that we are fully embarked on a "Beat Germany first" policy, we cannot afford to take halfway measures at such a crucial period. After holding down the eastern front for two years at terrific cost, our Russian allies deserve better things of us.

In the early fighting of this summer the Germans did exactly what the Russians and most neutral experts expected. An attack on the central front, made by some thirty divisions, found the defenders well prepared, and the attack stalled in ten days. Its significant features were: the use of only a small proportion of the estimated 220 divisions on the eastern front; the lack of the surprise element or of any originality in its launching; the restriction of the attack to a 160-mile sector, in contrast to the 480-mile sector chosen for the summer campaign of 1942 and the entire 1800-mile line of a year earlier; and the Nazis' utter inability to make important gains.

Most significant was the instant Russian reaction. The launching of a strong attack on the day following Germany's abandonment of its own offensive could only mean that the Nazis had been repelled with such ease that large numbers of available Russian reserves had not been needed. If the prevention of a Russian offensive was one of the objectives of the German campaign, it didn't work. Instant gains of more than twenty miles in certain sectors about Orel do not indicate that the Russian capacity to launch a counter-attack was crippled in the slightest degree.

Of even greater importance was the fact that the fighting indicated the relative strength of the combatants. The Russians' winter victories of the first year of battle were due in part to weather conditions. The Stalingrad debacle and later German defeats were attributable very largely to what Churchill called "the military intuition of Corporal Hitler." But this summer the Germans had none of these excuses for losing. They were beaten in a sector in which they had deliberately chosen to concentrate their strength. The Russian victories at Orel, Belgorod, and Kharkov were their first clear-cut victories that cannot possibly be ascribed to special circumstances.

What has brought about such a change?

The Allied air campaign has certainly hastened the deterioration of German armed strength, especially in weapons. The Luftwaffe, in Russia as everywhere else, has been spread too thin. If neutral reports are at all reliable, the recruiting campaigns in satellite countries have failed to bring in real reinforcements, and the problem of adequate reserves is becoming increasingly serious. Furthermore, the tactical superiority of the Germans, which permitted victories even against superior numbers in the early days of the war, has now disappeared. Though they excel in the defensive art of using mines to delay pursuit, their attack pattern is but little better than in 1941. And the answers to the Blitzkrieg have long since been found.

It would be highly inaccurate to attribute the failure of the Germans entirely to their ebbing strength. Russian resistance has improved as well. The Soviets now have a marked superiority in aviation and artillery, and probably in many other elements. And tighter discipline, better leadership, and much improved tactics are enabling them to get more out of the material at hand. The Red Army "found itself" as an offensive force only as recently as November, 1942, but in the succeeding ten months improvement has been continuous. In the all-important factor of morale, the advantage also clearly rests with them.

In the war of attrition now going on in Russia, the extent of territory occupied is not a completely accurate measure of progress. Yet the Russians' gains have been important. Orel, Belgorod, Kharkov, and other bases which the Germans regarded as most important for an attack on Moscow, are all in Russian hands. Other strong points, such as Stalino, Bryansk, and Smolensk are heavily threatened, and, barring a bogging down caused by the heavy rains expected early in the fall, may well be captured in a matter of weeks, if not days. Large economic resources have not yet changed hands as a result of this offensive, but the important Donets basin is threatened with recapture following Russian gains farther north. A retirement to the Dnieper line, which the Germans were barely able to avoid last winter, is, therefore, entirely likely.

Since Soviet strategy has been concerned mainly with the destruction of enemy troops, only secondarily with territorial gains, progress can be measured more accurately in terms of casualties than in terms of miles. Here official figures are worthless. Had the Germans, for example, suffered the million casualties which the Soviets claim, they would have lost far more than the thirty divisions they originally used in the attack. Nevertheless, losses for both sides have clearly been heavy. By flanking operations to cut the communication lines of the main German centers, the Russians have managed to avoid some of the casualties attendant upon the type of frontal attack the Germans employed at Stalingrad. These more economical tactics, added to the fact that Nazi retreat has in places been hurried, probably mean that of the two sides the Germans have sustained the heavier losses. And they are the less able to replace them.

However, enemy reverses on the Russian front alone are not sufficient to bring victory to the United Nations in the near future. Nothing resembling a large-scale break-through has yet occurred. The German retreats have been orderly and accompanied by so much mine-planting that close pursuit has been almost impossible. The earth has been thoroughly scorched. And above all, the Germans are still so far within the borders of Russia that they can still retreat for some time without imperiling their own homeland. Furthermore, it will take considerable time for Russian transport facilities to catch up with a lengthy German retreat so that new attacks can be launched. Though the Red Army is today better than the Wehrmacht, its margin of superiority is not great enough to insure victory.

It is possible, of course, that the biggest military moves of 1943 have yet to be made. Neither side in Russia has employed more than a fraction of its strength this summer. In the case of Germany this hesitation to use up limited reserves is quite understandable. But the Russians' reasons are not quite so clear. The armies which administered major defeats to the Germans six months ago are largely intact and have been used very little in the present campaign. A further, and doubtless much stronger, series of Red Army offensives is therefore certain.

Russia's demand for an attack on the really important areas of continental Europe is quite understandable. The building of a large-scale American army started fully three years ago. For half that time we have maintained troops in Britain. Yet not more than half a dozen American divisions were engaged in either the Tunisian or the Sicilian campaign, despite the fact that our High Command has deliberately chosen to make Europe the site of its greatest efforts. This is a miserable showing for a nation of our power and resources, and the British record is no better. For the past two years the Russians have done at least 90 per cent of the land fighting of the United Nations.

Let us hope that the Quebec conference, in addition to considering ways and means of defeating Japan, has recast our European strategy in the direction of greater boldness. The policy of making cautious attacks around the periphery of Hitler's European conquests was wise at an earlier period of the war, but if continued today, when our growing military might makes more direct blows feasible, it will result simply in continued bad relations with our main ally, Russia, an unnecessary prolongation of the war, and disagreement at the peace table.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Fascism in the Balkans

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

THE downfall of fascism in Italy has provoked repercussions throughout the Balkans—and particularly in Croatia. The abandonment of the Croatian throne by the Duke of Spoleto, the Savoy usurper, is the latest indication that the entire system of Italian domination has collapsed. The Germans have taken over the so-called "independent state" and transformed it into a republic.

In the early part of 1940, the establishment of the puppet state of Croatia was arranged between Mussolini and the Yugoslav fascist Ante Pavelich, in the presence of Count Ciano, while at the same time Mussolini was giving the Yugoslav government convincing assurance that its territorial integrity and neutrality would be respected. (Pavelich and his henchmen had been guests of the Fascist government in Italy since 1929.) On April 10, 1941, following the military collapse of Yugoslavia, the Ustasha leader Kvaternik proclaimed Croatia independent; and on April 13, Pavelich, announcing himself as Poglavnik, or Führer, appeared in Zagreb. On April 15, both Italy and Germany recognized the Independent State of Croatia, although its frontiers had not yet been established. On April 17, Pavelich dissolved all political parties and organized a government with every characteristic of an Italian vassal.

Other satellites immediately recognized their new colleague. Among the neutral states, the Caudillo's Spain hailed the new government as "Ustashi-Catholic-Moslem," and the Vatican, although it reserved its official blessing, received the Duke of Spoleto, Pavelich, and Ustashi delegates in private audience. Pavelich and Mussolini signed an agreement obliging Italy to guarantee the "independence" and integrity of the new kingdom for the next twenty-five years. Germany was to reap the economic fruits of the country, and it made sure of political influence by garrisoning the large cities and establishing Gestapo control over civilian life. A permanent economic mission under the leadership of Count Volpi di Misurata, an elderly Italian financial expert, was established for the exploitation of Croat products. With the definition of its frontiers, Croatia lost most of its important territories, including its entire Adriatic coastline, and it was obliged to pay the Italian government 125,000,000 liras a month for the expenses of occupation. Croatia had become part of the "New European Order."

The Ustasha movement is Fascist-Catholic in complexion, and was created and developed on Italian territory for the express purpose of dismembering Yugoslavia. Its doctrine is linked with the thesis that the Croatians are of Gothic origin and therefore unrelated to other southern Slavs. Its political philosophy is based upon that of Josua Frank, which has always served as an instrument of Austro-Germanism and which was inspired by hatred of the Serbs. By restoring the Croat crown and Sabor (parliament) of the Middle Ages Pavelich perverted the traditions of Croatia for his own totalitarian purposes. He himself admitted that the Ustasha organization was "profaned by the worst elements." "Do not be surprised," he said, "if sometimes the most horrible crimes are committed on behalf of the Ustasha movement." He referred to the massacres committed by his Ustashi on the innocent Serb and Jewish populations and on the Croatians who remained faithful to the ideal of a united Yugoslavia and to the democratic Peasant Party established some thirty years ago by Stefan Radich. Reports from Croatia estimate that about 300,000 Serbs were sacrificed by Ustashi leaders to deepen the abyss between Serbs and Croats.

Following Franco's example of giving his "empire" a combined Catholic-Moslem character, Pavelich drew from fanatical Moslem peasants his best recruits for Ustashi terrorist bands, for the Croatian legion sent to Russia, and for the Croatian SS divisions organized to fight the partisan forces. To satisfy the Moslems, Pavelich even thought of transferring the capital of Croatia to Banja-Luka in Bosnia, the center of the Moslem population. Instead, he transformed the seat of the Academy of Arts in Zagreb into a mosque.

At the beginning of the German attack on Russia, Germany requested that Croatian units be sent to the eastern front. The Croatians consistently refused to go, although their only alternative was to be sent to Bosnia to fight the partisans. An extensive report on the recruitment of Croatians for the eastern front was given by the Moscow newspaper Pravda in October, 1942. This report stated: "Having received Hitler's orders to create a division for fighting on the eastern front, the arch-bandit Pavelich set to work. In Zagreb, huge posters were set up at all street corners giving information regarding the enlistment of volunteers for the legion. Glorious promises were made and attractive inducements offered every volunteer. 'Your family will receive 3,000 kunas a month (200 German marks), the best of food, superior living quarters, ten hectares of land, horses and equipment. Convicts or those on trial will also be accepted and will receive a full pardon,' proclaimed these placards."

BURLINGAME

Pavelich recruited "volunteers" by sending Ustashi all over the country. Fifty people were taken one night in Sanski Most alone. They were told to sign up as volunteers. When they refused, most of them were shot. A Croatian who did go to the front—a Private Blaskovich—received a letter from his wife which we quote as it was published in Russia: "I am starving. Prices are fantastic and still rising. Meat, sugar, flour, salt, fruit, grapes—all have been taken to Germany. They have taken the cows and pigs. We receive only fifteen kilograms of flour per month for six people. What am I to eat? I don't know. I pray to God for all of us." And a Colonel Markulj wrote: "We have been deceived. The Germans treat us like swine. Our families have been robbed and are starving." Early this spring Pavelich had to withdraw his troops from Russia in order to use them on the home front.

Popular resistance started with a boycott of towns and cities by the peasantry, with local revolts in the cities, with sabotage and destruction of bridges and railroad lines, and with attacks upon Italian and German soldiers. Separate guerrilla units scattered over the country became united in the course of time into the Army of National Liberation. Entire regions such as Bosnia, Herzegovina, Lika, Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, and the Croat Littoral were taken by guerrilla forces and held for various lengths of time. In some instances, the guerrillas introduced their own administration and exercised control over transportation. "We are going through very serious days," admitted the puppet Minister of the Interior. "In Croatia, partisans are burning villages as well as factories. Underground activity is growing among the people. In the army all has not been well, and steps have had to be taken."

According to both Serb and Croat reports, 80 per cent of the Croatian masses have remained faithful to the Allied cause and to Machek, the great popular leader of the Croatian Peasant Party, while only 10 per cent of the people have become followers of Pavelich. When Pavelich appointed his parliament, forty-four of those chosen refused to participate. A member by the name of Ljubicich made this statement on behalf of his colleagues: "Only terror forced us to come here, and we came because we feared for our lives. We protest against the present situation in the country, against the arrest of Machek, and against the choice of the Duke of Spoleto as King of Croatia." "It is clear," the Ustasha chief Scholz stated over the radio, "that this is not a civil war in Croatia, but a part of the world war. That fact entitles us to expect help from our allies."

The Italian experiment in Croatia resulted in a complete breakdown of the Ustashi and the forces of occupation. "Croatia is an ulcer in Italy's side, like the former Yugoslav minority in Italy," concluded the Swedish paper Arbetaren. "Italian losses in the partisan war are immense, though the Gestapo and the Ustashi both took part in the hopeless task of pacification."

A confidential report from Croatia described the "complete disintegration" of the Ustasha régime. "The Ustashi have no authority. They maintain themselves by Gestapo methods, and with the aid of German and Italian armies, whose numbers are increasing daily in both Zagreb and the country districts. The valley of the Drave River, hitherto the most passive district in Croatia, is now aflame with revolt—to such an extent that from Virovititsa to Krizhevtai (an area equal to an American county) there are only two gendarmerie stations still standing."

German domination finally supplanted Italian. Mile Budak, rival of Pavelich and a reliable German tool, returned from Berlin to become Foreign Minister of the reorganized government. In the spring of 1943 the Ustasha militia was put under German command, and the movement was officially disbanded. The Hamburg Fremdenblatt reported that reorganization of the government was necessary "in order to eliminate the danger of dualism and mutual competition among ruling factions." The Berlin Lokalanzeiger stated on May 12 that all Ustashi officials had been dismissed by Pavelich, and added that this was not sensational since "there are many men among the Ustashi who bear the uniform, name, and honor of the movement but do not contribute actively to it. It is the wish of the Poglavnik, for the sake of the future, that there be fewer officials and more workers."

The peasant philosophy of the Croatian people seeks the rebirth of a Yugoslav commonwealth based upon democratic federalism. Constant reports from Croatia record demands of the people for a clear and precise statement of a federal democracy that will guarantee full political and social equality to Croatians, Serbs, and Slovenes in the post-war world. Meanwhile, the people are fighting. They are ready to open the gateway of the Balkans to the Allied armies of liberation when the signal is given.

There is a famous old Croatian. His name is Vladimir Nazor, and he is the best-loved poet of Yugoslavia—the translator of Dante, Shakespeare, Goethe, and Victor Hugo. Pavelich offered him membership in the Academy and Nazor refused. Then one day he disappeared from Zagreb. Some time later, these words echoed from the mountains of Dalmatia: "Let the people of Dalmatia and of the coastal islands rise up as one man. Let us help Slavism. Let us sing the glory of Croatia. Let us maintain our honor and our countenance, and when we are crowned with victory we shall look with pride at our past suffering and torments. Be neither slaves nor heroes, but merely men." The prophetic voice of Nazor resounds through the devastated lands of Dalmatia and Croatia, where the rebellious spirit of the people has never bowed to the Italian or German invader.

BY ARGUS

"AIR TERROR is our greatest worry," wrote Dr. Otto Kriegk, one of the most official of official Nazi columnists, in the Berlin Nachtausgabe on August 14. "If we endure the air war, we have won. Destiny requires this test of us." And Goebbels said in a speech August 17, "Aerial warfare is at present our greatest problem."

The seriousness of the problem is clearly shown by stories that appear in German newspapers. Consider, for example, the garbage situation in Essen. It shows that some effects of air raids are not relieved by time, but rather grow worse. On August 4, many weeks after the latest bombing of Essen, the National-Zeitung expressed grave alarm over the fact that garbage collection in the city had practically ceased. The administration of Essen's public services seems to have broken down completely. For a while trucks and teams from other cities helped out, but they were later recalled. As a result, householders now throw their "perishable refuse into the ruins of houses or into the streets," and piles of garbage are rising all over the city, "which during the present hot days cause an extremely bad odor and also bring about an increase in rats, mice, and fleas—a menace to public health which cannot be underrated."

The psychological effects of air raids were shown on July 31 by the Hamburg Zeitung—an emergency newspaper published jointly by the three large Hamburg papers, all of whose plants have been wrecked. The usual attitudes toward the war, according to its editorials, no longer exist in Hamburg. "Our feelings are now strongly subjective. No one could have imagined such catastrophe. . . . The fact that our nerves were not strong enough during these attacks is understandable. The measure of what human nature can endure was often exceeded." Only hatred and recriminations remain. "There is silly gossip about the Reichsmarschall [Göring]. Such rumors must be opposed by military measures," said the National-Zeitung of Bochum on August 11. And a Swedish correspondent who left Hamburg on August 13 wrote in the Svenska Morgonpost: "The bitterness of the people is turned against the Nazi government, which is held responsible for the unspeakable misery they are suffering. The general feeling is that Hitler started the war but the British have taken it over."

Can it be fear of spreading this state of mind that has caused the authorities to throw the evacuation of the city into reverse? Whatever the reason, in all parts of Germany efforts are being made to get the Hamburg refugees back home as soon as possible. On August 11 all north German newspapers published a notice which began as follows: "Hamburgers who have left home, do not forget that every able-bodied person is needed for the reconstruction of Hamburg. Return immediately! Register at your places of employment! Your return serves not only your community but also your own interests." But those who return voluntarily are so few that compulsion is also resorted to. The organized evacuation is being followed by organized "re-evacuation"—a new word, though an inept one, and a new field for the German genius for organization.

At the beginning of August, as has already been mentioned here, ration books for textile products were annulled throughout Germany. The decree ordered that household linen and clothing of all kinds could be bought only by air-raid victims, not by the general public. On August 14 a new and more far-reaching decree ordered all textile factories to close for six weeks. The decree covers all clothing and household linen. No explanation was given. It would be hard to find another shortage of raw materials so severe.

In this connection the destruction of factories in air raids is mentioned for the first time. Though armament factories, according to official accounts, are never bombed, the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung on August 8 spoke for the first time of the destruction of factories producing consumers' goods, "resulting in further restrictions of the standard of living. This direct effect of the war on civilian supplies is something entirely new in the history of our people. It is added to the indirect effects of maximum production of armaments at the expense of civilian production."

Fertilizer is incomparably more important for the intensive agriculture of Germany than for the relatively extensive agriculture of America. By far the most important of the German fertilizers are the nitrogenous ones; next in importance are the phosphates. At the end of July the Reichsstelle Chemie informed farmers that next year they will receive only 60 per cent as much nitrogenous fertilizer as this year—and the supply this year was only 85 per cent of what it was before the war. This means that in the coming year Germany's soil will get only 51 per cent of its normal supply of nitrogenous fertilizers. As for the phosphates, continued the announcement, the farmers had better not count on getting any, as the chief source was lost with Algeria and Tunisia. That being the case, the outlook for Germany's harvest in 1944 is darker than it has been in any previous year.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Real Spain

THE SPANISH LABYRINTH. By Gerald Brenan. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

MR. BRENAN'S long-awaited book is all that one had hoped it would be. It is an absolutely essential work, not only for the general reader but for the specialist in Spanish political history. There is, for example, no comparable account of Spanish anarchism and anarcho-syndicalism in English. The author's two chapters on this subject, as judicious and sympathetic a condensation as could be made, should set right some of the most important misconceptions about the Spanish civil war. But this is not the only excellence. The author's brief but illuminating review of the agrarian problem will serve to remind doctrinaires of all schools that this problem, the basis of all others in Spain, can receive no uniform solution. For the rest, the book finds its way through the incredibly complex conflicts of Spanish history from the Restoration of 1874 to 1936 with a quite remarkable sure-footedness and objectivity.

Mr. Brenan confines his treatment of the civil war and of the immediately preceding crisis to the last two chapters of his book. Some of the statements he makes demand rebuttal. Negrín did not issue the Thirteen Points "with a view to creating a movement favorable to reconciliation." Toward the end of 1938 Russia certainly decreased her aid to Spain but did not entirely withdraw it, as Mr. Brenan says.

Inadequate as Mr. Brenan admits they are, however, these two chapters throw much light upon the true nature of the tragic dilemma of Spain during the war. Even before the February, 1936, government announced it would attempt to solve the land problem, the Catholic Ceda Party, Austro-fascist in intention but almost German in its insolent temper, had determined to abolish parliament. After the February elections, however, the reactionaries began to plan their revolt in earnest.

Mr. Brenan is wrong, I think, in supposing that the Prieto policy of moderation, as opposed to Caballero's militancy, would have placated the Ceda. His mistake shows his inability to reach a clear understanding of the Spanish war-time dilemma. The leaders of the right wanted a counter-revolutionary insurrection which, they knew, would destroy the state apparatus and so make unavoidable a revolutionary defense of the Republic. The tragedy of Spain was that her people were thus forced to make a revolution in a counter-revolutionary world. The hostile set of the world then necessitated a sharp rightward swing if the Republic was to have any chance of surviving the Axis assault which soon developed. And that in turn produced a colossal political and psychological problem.

Mr. Brenan, who understands that the revolutionary answer to Franco was the only one immediately possible, is also aware that a rightward swing was inescapable. He knows why the Spanish Communist Party came to be the major check to the revolution. "A revolution would have alienated the democracies whom Stalin was courting at the time," he writes on page 307. But he knows also that it was not only the Russian necessity which was the cause of that turn to the right. In criticizing Caballero's leadership of the Socialist Party during the early months of 1936, he writes: "He therefore lacked a wide political view; otherwise he would have seen that the disposition of forces in Europe—to consider nothing else—would never tolerate the dictatorship of the working classes in Spain." And the author agrees that Stalin's famous September, 1936, letter to Caballero, urging a rightward move, contained sound advice.

But while the author sees that the revolutionary answer was inevitable, he shows little grasp of the profound spiritual tragedy that the necessary rightward swing involved. The accomplishments, the facts of the July-August days generated a vast tide of revolutionary exaltation in the workers, so that they necessarily felt themselves betrayed by the rightward swerve. It was that sense of betrayal, of despair, grief, and impotent rage which caused the misguided rising in anarcho-syndicalist Barcelona in May, 1937. And it was the foreseen defeat of that rising which facilitated the long-dreamed-of political maneuver which forced the left Socialists and the vast C. N. T. [the anarcho-syndicalist trade unions of Catalonia] out of the government. The right-wing swerve was absolutely necessary, but it was burdened with the tragic consequence that the bulk of the real working class of Catalonia thereafter never pulled its weight. The Communist Party, the old-time core of which, alone among those supporting Negrín, had the organizational skill, the discipline, the courage, and the unbreakable will to resist Franco, inevitably became the party of the propertied peasants, the shopkeepers, the small industrialists, the white-collar workers, and the petty bourgeoisie in general, ranged in Catalonia against the revolutionary masses of the working class.

It is not a fact to be set down with bitterness against anyone, nor does it of itself constitute valid criticism of the Communists. Yet there is no understanding of the Spanish tragedy if this truth is ignored. From it all the embitterments and all the sordid factional fights were born.

While he was yet in Madrid it seemed to this reviewer that the right-wing turn had started a strange race against time. The splendid creation of the Communists, the regular army, for a while offset the dissension and the loss of spirit which were slowly canceling out the new military efficiency. The question was always whether the European peoples would awaken to what was happening before Spain was either overwhelmed or fell apart. They did not awaken. Then, when the bourgeois Republicans and the right-wing Socialists (the only allies of the Communists) became utterly defeatist, the Communists were in reality left face to face with Franco. When the traitor Casado rose to surrender Spain into fascist hands, the Communist Party was thus the only force left to obey the Negrín directives. The regiments it controlled were called upon to overthrow Casado, but only the hard core of their forces held and these were shattered by the furious attack of the C. N. T. division of Cipriano Mera. The logic of world reaction had worked itself out.

Much of this process is visible in Mr. Brenan's account. In a forthcoming second volume, one hopes, he will serve us as well as he has in this, for what I have said in criticism should not be held against an altogether exceptional book, for which I have the warmest admiration.

RALPH BATES

A Mature Poet

NO BOUNDARY. By Lenore G. Marshall. Henry Holt and Company. $1.75.

LENORE MARSHALL'S two novels revealed a poet's sensibility, but the present book is the first collection of her verse. It bears none of the earmarks of a first volume of poems. She has waited to publish them in book form, with a wisdom that is everywhere apparent in her work, until she was assured that she had attained her full stature as a poet. What she offers us, then, is the result of mature feeling, long meditation, and patient craftsmanship. Most of the early lyrics printed here are worthy to stand beside the more recent inclusions, although one perceives a sure growth.

Naturally, not all the pieces are on the same high level. Alive to the ugly realities of our time, the poet is not always equal to dealing with them. What one might call the "social" poetry tends to overstatement or sentimentality, and sometimes to a prosiness that defeats its own purpose. There are a few facile pieces on themes that other lyricists have handled with a more masculine austerity and power. But even the slighter things show a true lyric gift; even the few awkward passages display a responsiveness to our contemporary predicament.

The book as a whole is distinguished by a nice perceptiveness. It shows, as one might expect, an appreciation of the many small beauties of living: the cricket's "chirp of light lament," the "mannered courtliness" of patrician horses galloping beside the sea, the rag wagon like a flower cart in the city, the "mobile porcelain waters" of a lake, the changing light and the altering seasons, the exciting variety of creatures and landscapes and interiors that enrich "this contemptible sweet planet." But beyond these, the book exhibits a rare sensitiveness to the more subtle motions of the mind. Not for nothing does the word "frail" recur on the pages, sometimes companioned by another adjective that seems to deny its validity, as where the poet records a "frail, eternal" beetle seen crawling in the sand of prehistoric caves, or the "frail giant towers" of the metropolis. She is steadily conscious of the confusions that surround and ambush us, and more especially of the paradoxes implicit in human relationships. These are explored with a courage that makes for penetrating insights. She understands the fluent nature of experience and yet is keenly sensible of those values that persist beyond our capacity to fix them. This double awareness is particularly clear in the title poem, which, like several other fine things, places Mrs. Marshall as a descendant of the metaphysicals. There is more tenderness than intensity in her poetry, but her best work has the searching, luminous quality that one associates with this school.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

Our "Forgotten Men"

BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN. By Carey McWilliams. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

WE AMERICANS have shouldered the white man's burden all too lightly; in fact it is doubtful whether we have been shouldering it at all, or merely dragging it at our heels, and wondering what is kicking up all the dust about our ankles. Long after our elder brothers in imperialism had begun to see their duty to the "native" as something more than providing razors for hairless chins, we were still unaware of the plight to which white domination and Western industrialism had reduced the various dark races who live under our flag. The early months of the war in the Pacific brought us to a tardy realization of our imperial responsibilities, and of our dependence on forgotten "native" populations. But how many of us are aware of the plight of the colored peoples, apart from the Negro, who live in the continental United States? To most Americans the race problem means only the Negro problem, and few even know that the term "colored people" applies to any races other than the Negro.

Mr. McWilliams's book presents a study of eight colored minorities in this country, eight isolated islands of underprivileged people, economically exploited, socially restricted, culturally maladjusted. They are: Indians, Chinese, Japanese, Puerto Ricans, Mexicans, Filipinos, Hawaiians, and of course Negroes—all within the continental United States. All but the Indians have been brought here by special interests that needed a coolie class, and once here they have never been permitted to become an integral part of our culture, or to share in the material benefits of an expanding economy or in the "inalienable rights" with which the Creator has supposedly endowed all men. Their health, their social and economic status, and their educational opportunities are far below the average which this country has to offer, poor as that average is in comparison with what it might be.

The unique contribution of this volume is Mr. McWilliams's study of the six immigrant groups: the Chinese and Japanese from the Orient, Puerto Ricans and Mexicans from Latin America, and the Filipinos and Hawaiians from the Pacific. These groups are the literally forgotten men of our democracy. They are the victims, not only of deliberate exploitation and organized prejudice in the communities where they are concentrated, but also of the indifference and ignorance of the overwhelming majority, who are hardly aware of their existence. How many Americans, for instance, know that Filipinos cannot become American citizens? How many know that there are about three and a half million Mexicans in the United States, some of them entirely Spanish-speaking even in the second and third generation, with only the most tenuous links with the American culture in the midst of which they are marooned? How many of us outside of the Pacific states have ever really cared about excluding the Chinese? These people are marooned or excluded, not by the will of the majority, but by its apathy. Mr. McWilliams shows, for instance, that most of the anti-Chinese measures were passed by Congress on the eve of national elections, when both parties were angling for the California vote, and neither had anything to lose in the other states by supporting them. The rest of us were willing to let California have her way with what was tacitly assumed to be her own problem.

It is of course a shock to be reminded that this has been regarded for half a century as California's problem. Today the significance of these six immigrant minorities, and of their treatment at our hands, is international. In America they are forgotten men, but in Mexico and China and Hawaii and the Philippines they are remembered. And we are remembered there for our discrimination against them, and for the underlying master-race consciousness which it bespeaks. What a weapon to put into the hands of the Axis agents in these countries! And, as Mr. McWilliams points out, what a weapon we thus placed in the hands of the militarist party in Japan decades ago! We have reaped the whirlwind without even knowing that we had sown the wind.

Mr. McWilliams has assembled an enormous body of data from reliable studies which have been made of these people, and of course he brings to it his own first-hand knowledge of many of them. His material on the Negro is largely historical, tracing the change in public opinion on this question from the Civil War to the present time, when the contribution of anthropologists and sociologists has ripened and should serve as the basis of an affirmative policy of racial understanding and cultural adjustment. It is somewhat confusing, however, to find the bulk of the study devoted to the non-Negro colored peoples, while the program for action is presented almost exclusively in the light of the Negro problem. To be sure, Mr. McWilliams has established his thesis that the race problem must be attacked as a whole, and that any piecemeal solution in terms of individual groups is doomed to failure. But he ought to have indicated more explicitly and more frequently whither he is leading the reader. One wishes, too, that he had straightened the twists in the path and smoothed out the bumps in his prose. Yet these shortcomings will blind nobody to the fact that he is taking us over territory of primary strategic importance.

THEY ALSO RAN: THE STORY OF THE MEN WHO WERE DEFEATED FOR THE PRESIDENCY. By Irving Stone. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

SINCE 1824, nineteen men in the United States have had one thing in common. They ran for the Presidency on the tickets of the main political parties and were defeated. What kind of President would each have made? What were their backgrounds, their characteristics, their beliefs? What kind of men were they? Would the country have fared better had they been elected instead of their opponents?

Irving Stone in his usual colorful and zestful style, backed by competent scholarship, has attempted to answer these questions. Using the biographical method, Mr. Stone sketches the life story of each of these men. These biographical sketches are not exhaustive, but they are sufficiently informative to give the reader a rounded and understandable picture of each candidate. In addition, Stone has written detailed accounts of each election campaign and, although one campaign is pretty much like another, the author has managed to dust off the oblivion that coated these old battles so that they sparkle anew.

According to Mr. Stone, the electorate picked the better candidate eight times, the wrong candidate eight times; in the other three instances it wouldn't have mattered which candidate was elected.

Stone thinks that the United States would have benefited had Seymour, Cass, Hancock, Scott, Greeley, Cox, Fremont, and Davis been elected, but that the electorate was correct in rejecting Clay, Bryan, Douglas, Blaine, McClellan, Landon, Hayes (Tilden was actually elected), and Willkie. In the Parker-Roosevelt, Hughes-Wilson, and Smith-Hoover elections, either candidate was suitable.

Mr. Stone's appraisals are the interpretations of a liberal. If you accept all or most of them, the conclusion is inevitable that thus far democracy has barely proved itself. In casting around for reasons for this state of affairs, Mr. Stone finds:

> Throughout this story it has been evident that party lines have proven stronger than independent judgment; countless crimes against the welfare of the country and the best interests of the people have been committed in the name of partisanship. Popular government is thus faced with a dilemma: a two-party system is necessary to the functioning of a democracy, yet out of the two-party system has arisen a majority of the political ills of the nation. No political sulpha-drugs have been evolved which could eradicate these election diseases.

In the light of what is going on in the United States today, Mr. Stone's book has a particular relevancy. The elections of 1942, the actions of Congress, black markets, the race riots are an all-too-familiar pattern of American history. A pattern you will better understand after reading "They Also Ran."

GEORGE JOEL

ALTHOUGH it is usually as meaningless to separate the style of a novel from its story as to separate the way an artist lays his paint on canvas from the content of his picture, Enrique Amorim's "The Horse and His Shadow" (Scribner's, $2.50) is one instance in which the division must be made. The cheap, muddy prose of this Uruguayan novel stands like a wall between the reader and a truly powerful novelistic conception. Of course Mr. Amorim wrote his book in Spanish and it would be easy to blame the bad prose on his translators—except that there is sufficient proof that the translation is faithful and that Mr. Amorim himself fancies his stylistic mannerisms. There is his habit of verbless sentences, whole paragraphs of them. There is his device of delaying a necessary explanation: for instance, when a blind character is introduced, we are in his company for fifteen pages before we are told of his affliction. There is even the trick—or perhaps it is no trick, but simply failure—of skipping explanation entirely: what is the role, for example, of the well-driller, Hoffman, in this novel? Even after we begin to catch on to, and are caught by, Mr. Amorim's story, we must reconcile ourselves to puzzlement and irritation.

Like most good South American fiction I have read, "The Horse and His Shadow" is a revolutionary novel but unlike the revolutionary fiction of our own country, it is subtle, fluid, based deep in the drama of human relationships. The action moves between the estancia of Nico Azara, outside Montevideo, and the community of Polish refugees and poor natives who live on the fringes of Nico's lands; on the estancia itself there is every shade of political opinion. In addition to the peons at the one extreme, and the arrogant Nico at the other, there is Adelita, Nico's wife, an aristocrat of decent liberal opinions; there is Bica, her servant but also her illegitimate half-sister, who lives in lonely severity among the men ranchers; there is Marcelo, Nico's brother, sought by the government for his part in smuggling refugees into Uruguay. Mr. Amorim, however, measures neither the decency and courage nor the weakness of these people by the familiar yardstick of their social-political views. If it is Marcelo who brings to the estancia the gift of the stallion, Don Juan, symbol of life-creating powers, and Marcelo who gives the stricken family of refugees permission to cross his brother's lands, it is also Marcelo who seduces Bica and then calmly goes on his way, leaving her pregnant. Again, Nico is the dark force of reaction in the book who, by refusing his neighbors access to the road across his fields, precipitates the tragedy with which the book ends; but the stallion knows Nico for his master, and in the duel in which Nico loses his life, the horse allows his body to be used as a barricade by his owner; Nico's death itself, for that matter, is a display of the kind of heroism which fiction likes to reserve for heroes. Even the poor people in Mr. Amorim's novel, the gauchos and the struggling refugees, are shown quite naked of grandeur in an amazing scene in which two of their number steal the services of Don Juan for a broken-down mare. What Mr. Amorim is saying is what is too seldom said in fiction these days, that it is from the new and the old, from the mixture of good and evil, of the progressive and the retarding, that society must advance, and he says it in the only way fruitful for the novelist—by drama and even by melodrama.

It is of course dangerous to use the larger animals symbolically in fiction: one slip and the whole business becomes laughable. But unlike the stallion, say, in D. H. Lawrence's "St. Mawr," the horse whose shadow is so pervasive in Mr. Amorim's novel is never absurd because it is not only a sexual symbol but also an economic symbol, indeed an economic fact. This play between symbolisms and between symbol and reality strikes me as a fine complication in a novel of revolution. It almost makes us forgive Mr. Amorim's wretched writing.

By now you will have been assailed by the avalanche of advertising extolling the virtues of Betty Smith's "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" (Harper, $2.75). I am a little bewildered by so much response to so conventional a little book. Like the heroine of her first novel, Miss Smith was born and raised in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, but even without knowing this fact we could guess that the story was autobiographical. Women authors, especially, always regard their own childhoods as if the process of growing up were an experience reserved for people who will one day have the sensibility to write a book about it, and Miss Smith even falls into the common error of forgetting that it takes time to learn the language of literary sensibility: at sixteen, even at eleven, her Francie Nolan thinks with the mind of the mature Betty Smith. I quote at random: "She began to understand that her life might seem revolting to some educated people. She wondered, when she got educated, whether she'd be ashamed of her background. Would she be ashamed of her people; ashamed of handsome papa who had been so light-hearted, kind, and understanding; ashamed of brave and truthful mama, who was so proud of her own mother, even though granma couldn't read or write; ashamed of Neely, who was such a good, honest boy? No! No! If being educated would make her ashamed of what she was, then she wanted none of it." Well, I submit that these are neither the thoughts nor the words of an adolescent girl, but the thoughts and words of a mature person creating a "literary" image of herself as an adolescent girl.

Because Francie Nolan is very poor, Irish, a Catholic, and I suppose because a member of her family drinks, I have seen "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" compared to the novels of James Farrell, and all to the credit of Miss Smith's novel. This makes me very sad both for the condition of fiction reviewing and for Mr. Farrell, whatever his faults as a novelist of stature. Of course Francie Nolan's story is more cheerful than Danny O'Neill's and a more popular commodity, but surely popular taste should be allowed to find its emotional level without being encouraged to believe that a "heart-warming" experience is a serious literary experience.

DIANA TRILLING

IN BRIEF

A HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Dwight Lowell Dumond. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

This general introduction to our history extends from the beginnings of English colonization to Pearl Harbor. Professor Dumond dedicates his book to "the young men and women who may be troubled by the present strange ways of the world about them, for I am confident that they will find some peace of mind from the perusal of its pages." His volume is an addition to the growing number of textbooks which are concerned with bringing American history closer to the student and reader. For example, the colonial period is not unduly expanded, although its high points are covered. On the other hand, modern times are given the attention they warrant. Professor Dumond is an authority on the slavery question, and his chapters on the pre-Civil War decades are particularly notable for their detail and analyses. The volume contains a group of interesting reproductions of eighteenth-century maps.

NATIONAL CONSCIOUSNESS. By Walter Sulzbach. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.

What is time? "If you don't ask me I know it, if you do, I don't." This was St. Augustine's answer to the question. A similar answer could be given to the question: What is a nation? Is it the homeland, the race, the language, the tradition, which creates the consciousness of unity? Professor Sulzbach's analysis of all these questions is based on a thorough knowledge of the vast literature dealing with the most dangerous of all current problems. He hopes that after this war it will be possible to sublimate the fighting impulse and to ridicule the ideology of nationalism in the same way as Cervantes's Don Quixote gave the death blow to the romanticism of medieval knighthood. Professor Sulzbach's book is well written and worth reading, but he seems to underestimate the economic forces behind nationalism. And although nationalism has become "a secular religion," in view of recent events we cannot subscribe to the author's statement that "the Pope's influence is so unimportant in international affairs that modern history can almost ignore it." The Washington-Madrid-Rome-Axis is not good evidence for this opinion.

FILMS

SEEING Ernst Lubitsch's "Heaven Can Wait" was a little like hearing Louis Armstrong play at his present best. It brought back a time when people really made good movies: it was so good I half believed Lubitsch could still do as well as the best he ever did, if he had half a chance.

"Heaven Can Wait" is not up to his best; nothing has been, for nearly twenty years. Its real matrix, for that matter, is the sort of smirking, "civilized," Central European puff paste with which the Theater Guild used to claim to bring vitality to the American stage. But it looks like a jewel against the wood-silk and cellophane which passes for a moving picture now that Hollywood has come of age. It has few of the jaw-breaking Lubitsch touches which at last I got tired of years ago and a lot of the gentler ones which, ham or not, I shall always like, and it has a good deal of the dry sparkle, the shrewd business, and the exquisite timing which made pictures like "Forbidden Paradise" and "Three Women" some of the best non-major jobs ever done. The sets, costumes, and props are something for history. I have to speak of it with less authority than intuition, but I thought the period work, in these respects—as in Lubitsch's modulations in styles of posture and movement—was about the prettiest and the most quietly witty I had ever seen. The color was just as good; it was used with sensitiveness and wit, I thought, for the first time. The script was hardly less accomplished, a beautifully set mosaic of kidded clichés. I saw nothing but good, anywhere, in the doll-like selection, manipulation, and performance of the large cast. That does not surprise me in people like Charles Coburn and Louis Calhern and Laird Cregar, but when you find it also in Don Ameche and Gene Tierney, amazed tribute is due somebody. It is certainly due Lubitsch; and (another superlative is unavoidable) it is due the most resourceful make-up job I have ever seen; and finally (I can still hardly believe it) it is due Mr. Ameche and Miss Tierney.

Good sets and props have done a lot for still another picture this month; excellent lighting, good camera work, and unusually good bit-casting have added so much edge and vitality that "The Fallen Sparrow" passes among many people for the almost-Hitchcock spy melodrama it certainly is not. Otherwise, the show is no harm and no special good; about the speed of second-best Pocket Book mysteries. Someone should tell Maureen O'Hara that if she is pretending to be a granddaughter of a French prince, she should leave off aiding China long enough to avoid calling him "France Wah." I have heard mild pleasure expressed over the fact that in this film the hero comes right out and says he fought the fascists in Spain. That seems to me to be now the strict equivalent of coming right out and saying that you were with Lee in Virginia. I should add that Mr. Garfield is required to explain that he has come of melodramatic age only since the outbreak of the World War (which set in, I understand, in 1939), and went to Spain merely as an eyedillist, doing what any kid would do.

Diana Trilling, writing about "Claudia" in book form, has said everything about her that so badly needed saying. Of the film version I can add only that it is very much worth seeing if you have a healthy mind and a sound stomach. What you see is a rather shrewdly lighted demonstration, on the part of a baby wife, an anthropophagous mother, and a gosh-all-friday husband, of their fetal, and nationally archetypical, incompetence to live; so presented that the audience, in a grand passion of self-recognition, cackles with delight. I cannot believe that this is good for the audience. A comic catharsis is as possible as a tragic and is, I suspect, more beneficent as well as more true (I still wait for an adequate comic treatment of "Hamlet" or "Lear"). But those aspects of "Claudia" which make it funny (to some) and the powder-puff gags which point it up, to say nothing of the processes of self-dethronement which must be shanghaied into service if one is to laugh at it, or pass it off, are not possible of catharsis, which is possible only to the pure in heart, the fearless; the whole business is, rather, auto-intoxication of the most sinister and endemic sort. There could be, and usually are, more thunderous diagnostic epitaphs upon dead civilizations, but when this one gets its turn, one that will do as well as any other ("Honesty is the best policy," "A boy's best friend is his mother," "I've got my living to make," "I got my orders," "Do you love me?" "How do you feel?" and "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance" are other apt candidates) is "Grin and bear it."

As Robert Stebbins wrote several years ago, Fred Astaire has a lot, besides his Mozartian abilities as a tap-dancer, which is as great, in its own way, as the best of Chaplin. It is in the walk, the stance, the face, the voice, the cool, bright, yet shadowless temper, and it would require the invention of a new character, the crystallization of a new manner, probably the development of a new cinematic form, to be adequately realized. It is present in "The Sky's the Limit," and gives the first half hour such charm and flow I half expected another "Top-Hat." I didn't get it. I liked the idea of a short, quiet musical about three people who, for once, play a triangle which is not an Iscariot marathon; but it would have required first-rate style and polishing in every department to come off, and had it in none. Astaire's new partner Joan Leslie has something, too, of a primitive sort. The not very eloquent but mailable way of saying it is that she is sometimes very uncomplicatedly pretty.

MUSIC

MY North Carolina correspondent who wrote me from Boston about the first of the summer concerts by members of the Boston Symphony has continued to report on the subsequent concerts; and some of his observations are too interesting not to be shared with the readers of this column. As it happens, moreover, they are relevant to what I discussed last week—the unique insight and rectitude with which Ravel dealt with Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the normal lack of these qualities in the other men who revised and transcribed Mussorgsky's music.

The second concert began with a Toccata, Bourée, and Giga by Scarlatti-Casella, concerning which my correspondent—who has the sharp perception of what goes on in an orchestral performance that one can have only from playing in orchestras (which is not to say that everyone who plays in orchestras has this perception)—writes that "the orchestration . . . is not very good late Italian after the manner of Respighi, though with the piano (thank God) left out. It is noisy, flashy, and slick; much given to instrumental 'effects,' but with little feeling for timbres, and a defective understanding of the use of choirs; too much of all the instruments playing together without achieving a real tutti; and a badly misplaced enthusiasm for the instruments of percussion. I fancy Scarlatti's hair would have stood on end if he could have heard the various snare-drums, tambourines, xylophones, tin pans, and what-nots that found their way into the score. The net result of all this is totally to obscure the style of the music without adding anything to it. The French, when in their right mind, do this sort of thing much better."

After Schubert's Fifth Symphony, Ravel's Pavane, and Ibert's Capriccio came the Suite No. 1 from Stravinsky's music "after Pergolesi" for the ballet "Pulcinella." My correspondent discusses the music and the orchestration separately; and of the music he estimates roughly that 60 per cent is Pergolesi, 5 per cent Stravinsky imitating Pergolesi, and the rest Stravinsky "imitating (very badly) his first style (30 per cent)" or "inadvertently succumbing to his old mannerisms (5 per cent)." Of this "the Pergolesi . . . is often very charming indeed, even (up to a point) with Stravinsky mannerisms sticking through, as in the Overture." But the results are very bad when Pergolesi gets mixed up with early Stravinsky. "He very nearly wrecks the Serenata (which should be a very lovely thing) in this manner by introducing some very unnecessary snorts and groans into the middle section. . . . The Duetto is a nightmare: as if Stravinsky dreamed up all that was worst about his early work and flung it into a short number for small orchestra. It has nothing whatsoever to do with Pergolesi, nor with anything else in the suite except the Finale. The little Menuetto starts out well enough, but before it has got very far it is enveloped in a transition almost like the one that leads into the coda of "The Firebird" (Stravinsky imitating himself), which leads into the Finale, which is some more imitation of the early Stravinsky: hammer-like rhythms mercilessly pounded out at the top of the orchestral voice, and small phrases thrown around and repeated ad nauseam. These two movements alone are enough to prove that Stravinsky hasn't the slightest idea what 'after Pergolesi' really means; one is not forced to examine the many minor incongruities to demonstrate the matter."

Of the orchestration 0 per cent is Pergolesi, 70 per cent modern French school, and 30 per cent "Stravinsky imitating his early orchestrations (i. e., Russian school, post-Rimsky-Korsakov). That is to say, the larger part of the suite (roughly . . . the part in which Pergolesi predominates) is scored in an intelligible manner for small orchestra, without recourse to Stravinsky's arsenal of (often misguided) orchestral virtuoso effects. It is the kind of orchestration a cultured French composer of the time might do: Honegger might have orchestrated the larger part of the suite; Ravel would have done it with greater sensitiveness"; and it shows "the extent to which [Stravinsky] had become identified with his adopted environment. The old Stravinsky crops out only when he is imitating himself: then we have such things as duets in the double basses against dissonant melodies in the trombone, and cries and wails torn from the extreme ranges of the winds, and snorts and grunts from the horns." And, my correspondent might have added, the notorious jazz glissandos from the trombone.

Lida Gustava Heymann

Dear Sirs: Your readers will be grieved to learn of the death of one of the most prominent women in Europe: Lida Gustava Heymann. She was one of the strongest among the leading personalities of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. She was a world citizen in the widest sense, complete in integrity and nobility of spirit and temperament, magnanimous in what she gave and thought and did, of unbending will and unshakable civil courage.

Few of her international coworkers and friends suspected that she was a member of a prosperous Protestant commercial family of Hamburg. They knew her only as the firebrand who stood always on the side of all victims of injustice. She founded the first progressive kindergarten in Hamburg, the first progressive school for girls, the first training school for girl clerks; and her movement for the abolition of brothels and the regulation of prostitution left an enduring impression on the social institutions of her home town.

Then, shortly after 1900, came her move to Munich and decades of happy and fruitful work with Anita Augspurg: the building of an independent woman-suffrage movement, work for universal, equal, secret, and direct votes for men and women, and work for international peace. Together with women of other countries she organized the International Congress of Women at the Hague in 1915 and played a leading part in its meetings and in the International Women's Committee for Permanent Peace, which it founded. When, in 1919 in Zürich, this committee took the name of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, she became its vice-president and the leading spirit of the German section.

In the spring of 1917 she was expelled from Munich because of her opposition to the war. She returned there, however, when the war was over. When women obtained suffrage in 1918 she founded a periodical, Woman in the State, which she edited with Anita Augspurg for fifteen years. As she stood against the World War during 1914 to 1918, so later she stood against the civil war in Germany. When in Bavaria White and Red troops stood facing one another, it was at her suggestion that women went to the soldiers and induced them to agree not to fire on one another. When Hitler began his Putsches, she and her coworkers demanded his banishment from Bavaria, but the Bavarian government was afraid of "making martyrs."

In 1933 she was again an exile, but her energies did not lessen. In a little attic in Zürich she wrote her books, made regular contributions to magazines and newspapers, and helped hundreds of members of the Women's International League who had been driven from home and were living in many different countries. A whole generation of internationally minded women are deeply conscious of their great indebtedness to Lida Gustava Heymann and will find strength in the memory of her vitality, her elemental power of intuition, and her faith in women's active and creative powers.

A Natural Tory Retorts

Dear Sirs: In your issue of August 14 appeared a letter from Edward J. Leonard which I quote: "I am willing to grant that certain minds which are truly informed might honestly arrive at a reactionary conclusion, a conclusion which I would reject. These are natural Tories and not all of them are uninformed or unintelligent. Their limitation is one of heart rather than of head. They are ungenerous and lack a social conscience. They need more of the milk of human kindness. Also, usually, they are unimaginative."

The most irritating quality of the so-called liberal is his confusion of his political principles with universal moral laws. He is never willing to allow the conservative another interpretation of justice and morality, even a misguided one. His is the right one, and there is nothing more to be said. The conservative must be either a fool or a knave. The conscientious conservative will acknowledge the good intention and integrity of the radical whose ideas he detests, but he seldom has this courtesy reciprocated. Further, the conservative will read the opinions of representative liberals in such publications as The Nation, if only to see what he has to contend with from the party which is predominant, at present, in the field of ideas. Yet the liberal will seldom, if ever, concern himself with the writings of intelligent conservatives, past or present, since he, in his enlightenment, can gain nothing from such stuff.

I am not a Republican and never have been, but I am one of Mr. Leonard's natural Tories and not ashamed of the name. Conscientious Tories are capable of devotion to duty and principle quite equal to that of any liberal.

Riga or Niger?

Dear Sirs: The reference in your issue of May 29—I've just been running through my Nation file before turning it over to the Extension Division—to "the young lady of Riga, who smiling rode out on a tiger," raises a number of interesting questions.

Historically speaking, in so far as history is recorded in literature, wasn't it a young lady of Niger who rode out thus? Incidentally, wouldn't Niger give a more convincing background for the episode? Where would a young lady of Riga get a tiger to ride out on?

Psychologically speaking, could we account for the change to Riga through our contemporary Russian alliance? Then, linguistically—or perhaps better, dialectically—speaking (if we concede Riga instead of Rega), what about the end rhyme? The Eastern trick of pronouncing "r" where it isn't instead of where it is puzzles a Westerner, even of New England antecedents. If the Easterner pronounces "Rig*er*," what becomes of "tig*ah*"? If a Westerner has to be called in to say "tig*er*," what becomes of "Rig*a*"?

Material here for a doctor's thesis!

R. MORGAN

Lawrence, Kansas, August 20

[Mr. Morgan's linguistic argument is stronger than his geographic one. After all, the Niger is a river and not a place, and there is no suggestion that the young lady was a water nymph. Moreover, the authorities do not support his theory. "The Oxford Dictionary of Quotations" gives the stamp of its approval to the Riga version, crediting it to Langford Reed's "The Limerick Book."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Hard Choice for Italy

Dear Sirs: On August 12 a domestic broadcast of the OWI stated that the press in Italy is not free, because it is Badoglio who appoints the editors. His régime, said the OWI broadcast, is therefore like the Fascist. On the same day it was announced that the newspaper Corriere di Catania had started publication under the direction of the Amgot.

The OWI broadcasts say that there has not been any change in the Italian régime because the different parties are not legally recognized. The Amgot has suppressed for the duration all political activities in Sicily and has prohibited any contact with anti-Fascist exiles.

The Atlantic Charter promises freedom of religion. According to an A. P. dispatch General Alexander, governor of Sicily, has recommended that Sicilian schools be put under the jurisdiction of the Catholic church. This dependence was abolished in Italy after the Bourbons' régime.

In occupied Italy the people are violently eliminating the Fascists. In Sicily the Fascists, if not too compromised, are preserved in the administration. And Amgot selects Cardinal Lavitrano, one of the most fiery Fascists in Sicily, as "spokesman" for the Sicilians. How can the Italian people make a decision? How can they, under the air attacks, choose between the Badoglio régime and that of the Amgot?

Fathers Should Fight

Dear Sirs: What's all the hullabaloo about drafting fathers? Why all this sudden, solicitous slush and sentimentality? It all seems to emanate from sources which, in the past, were none too cooperative in the war effort.

When it came to defending their respective countries, England, Russia, and China, our allies, made no distinction between sons and their sacrosanct fathers. Are we to pamper our adult men now? A fine example and inspiration for our boys in the service! It was the fathers who passed the act directing our boys to shoulder arms; how about their pitching in a bit themselves?

It's about time for the people to speak loud enough for every official in and out of Congress to hear and fear. On the whole, our armed forces have done a splendid job to date. The draft is primarily of military necessity and concern. The isolationists, the sob-sisters, and the crackpots, do they think they can do better than our Commander-in-Chief and Generals Hershey and Marshall? They have done enough damage already.

P. S. My only son, God bless him, enlisted before being drafted. I wouldn't mind being in the service, too. Yes, I've applied. M. H. COHN

Variations on the Four Freedoms

Dear Sirs: During a midwinter blackout two of us happened to be on a country hillside reviewing the Four Freedoms. Being nonconformists at heart, we felt that perhaps what this particular section of civilization needed at the moment was four quite different freedoms, freedoms less orthodox and more honest, freedoms which offered more challenge than security.

For one thing, we were tired of being forced to comment on everything. On a moment's notice we all had to be for or against Giraud, for or against the British stand in India, for or against Ruml's Pay-As-You-Go Plan. We were expected to revise our judgments hourly. Not only that, but we had to say what we thought as soon as we had thought it. If we hadn't thought yet, we had to cook up some ambiguity. We had to comment on the commentators who were already commenting too much. And then our comments were commented on, and so it went, getting nobody anywhere and completely clouding the issue. Freedom from speech, at least until everyone let his thinking and knowledge catch up with his comments, seemed to have very definite advantages.

As for freedom of religion, it seemed to us that perhaps what the gods needed was not so much ceremony as cooperation. If you could be ceremonious and cooperate at the same time, fine. But if there had to be a choice, we favored freedom from ceremony in behalf of freedom for cooperation. That reminded us of a road sign we had seen back in 1941 when things—cities and ideologies, races and creeds and ships—were beginning to be demolished at an alarming rate: "Danger—construction ahead." How much danger there is in construction we should have learned by this time.

At this point we heard a panther very close by us in the bushes. It breathed heavily and moved nearer. Freedom from fear was fast proving more of a strain than freedom of fear. We wanted to be afraid of the dark and of panthers. It seemed more honest somehow. We wanted to be afraid of what was going to happen next both on the hillside and in the war. We wanted to be afraid that we might not live happily ever after. We were quite sure we wouldn't. We wanted to be afraid of Germany and Japan. They seemed formidable. We wanted to be afraid of what our own statesmen would do, and we thought they might do wiser things if they were afraid too. People in general didn't seem half enough afraid. The panther in the bush never jumped. But that didn't make us less fearful of panthers we have met since. Some people wouldn't ever believe there were any panthers. We saw its tracks in the snow the next morning.

We knew that freedom from want in its present strenuous sense was not to be toyed with. We longed desperately for the day when no one would be unfed, unclothed, and unsheltered—and unhappy. And yet, taking liberties with the word "want," we knew that if the day came when no one wanted something he didn't have, progress and civilization would be at an end. When cows stop reaching under the fence for the grass on the other side, when men stop wanting to make better wheelbarrows and to write better poetry, freedom will lose its meaning. We resolved to encourage freedom of want. As far as we were concerned, we were going to let people want anything they wanted to want. It is a promising sign when people want things they haven't got or want to do things better than they have ever done them. And it is a still more promising sign when some of the people want other people to have things they haven't had and perhaps haven't even had the freedom to want.

THOSE WHO ARE INCLINED TO HOVER WITH anxiety over American-Russian relations must find their nerves somewhat jangled after developments of the past week. Ever since the formation of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow, Stalin's wry announcement that he had not been invited to Quebec, and the recall of Ambassadors Maisky and Litvinov, the atmosphere has been charged with doubt. It would be remarkable if this were not the case, despite Brendan Bracken's fatuous attempt to belittle the ambassadorial shifts as routine diplomatic moves. We sympathize with the desire of the Administration to dispel suspicion, but its chosen method can hardly be said to have cleared the air or inspired confidence. The approach has been threefold: to make no public acknowledgment that any differences exist, to repeat over and over again that relations are "cordial" and that the Soviet government "has been kept fully informed" of all Anglo-American decisions, and to lash out hysterically at critics who suggest that we have not done all we might to satisfy the complaints of our Russian ally. The week was notable for the concentration of statements by the President, the Secretary of State, and Assistant Secretary Berle affirming in the most general terms the solidarity of Soviet-American relations and defending the political record of the State Department. As though in support was Churchill's speech at Quebec, eulogizing the Russians extravagantly while rebuffing their demand for an immediate second front. And to top off the week came Hull's savage assault on Drew Pearson, who had accused the Secretary of wanting to see the Soviets "bled white," and the even more savage coup de grace administered to the columnist by the President of the United States.

IF THIS BLEND OF DEFENSIVENESS AND truculence betrays nothing so much as an acute attack of jitters in Washington, the alarmed observer will have to look hard for reassurance from other quarters. As if deliberately spurning the verbal advances on this side of the Atlantic, the Soviet government picked this particular week to allow War and the Working Class—an increasingly favored, if unofficial, mouthpiece—a field day of criticism at the expense of Britain and the United States. "Notwithstanding repeated Soviet offers," writes a Russian general in that journal, "the Allies never once expressed a desire to have troops side by side with our armies on the Soviet-German front." The Sicilian campaign once more is belittled and the refusal of the Russians to give our airmen Soviet bases from which to attack the Ploesti oil fields is defended on the ground that we had refused to base aircraft on Russian soil for joint attacks against Germany, the "real enemy." Elsewhere in the magazine the Allied Military Government is raked over the coals as "based on principles which have nothing in common with the principles of democracy." On the brighter side, two steps are informally reported from Washington: a prospective meeting of the foreign ministers of Britain, Russia, and the United States; and the creation of an Allied Mediterranean Commission with Soviet representation. These moves may herald a great deal, or they may prove to be no more than makeshift responses to heightened pressure. The effects of a second front in Western Europe are easier to predict. Lacking the military omniscience of Earl Browder, we do not insist upon that long-awaited operation this afternoon, but when it does come it should in fact sweep away the ugly fog that has settled down over American-Soviet relations.

WINSTON CHURCHILL CANNOT BE COUNTED on for colorless routine even on the occasion of receiving an honorary degree, and his remarks at Harvard are bound to be variously and vigorously interpreted according to the interests and prejudices of the interpreter. They are sure to be ascribed by some to schemes for an Anglo-American Century and equally sure to be put down by the lunatic, or McCormick, fringe of Anglophobes as the opening gun in a campaign to return the United States to the status quo ante 1776. Hypersensitive Russophiles will perhaps see in its exclusiveness a slight to the Soviets, and naturally there is the usual quota of Republican statesmen who see in this, as in every manifestation human and divine, a facet of the conspiracy to elect Mr. Roosevelt for the fourth time. For our part, we welcome Churchill's proposal to retain the present machinery of Anglo-American cooperation after the war. It seems realistic to us, in the light of the past, to assume that the armistice will find us with no specific plan for the peace. The Anglo-American machinery which is functioning so well in the war offers something in the way of a concrete and already operative basis for further development. Besides the Combined Chiefs of Staff Committee, Mr. Churchill presumably has in mind such effective agencies as the combined boards for shipping adjustment, export markets, food, and production and resources. We would much prefer to see Russia and China, not to mention all the other United Nations, in a workable agency of collaboration immediately after the armistice. But until such machinery can be set up, it would seem to us inexcusable to permit the extinction of the one tangible advance that has been made in this direction.

THE ATTACK ON MARCUS ISLAND APPEARS to be more than merely another harassing raid on Japanese outposts. Reports from Tokyo indicate that it was made in great force, with battleships and two or more carriers participating. While there is no evidence that an attempt has yet been made to land troops, the size of the operations suggests that they may be preparatory to an attempt to seize the island. Of all the Pacific islands under Japanese control, Marcus would be the biggest prize at this stage of the war. Unlike Midway, Wake, or most of the other mid-Pacific islands, it has sufficient area for adequate air fields. It is within easy bombing range of Tokyo for Flying Fortresses or Liberators, but it is far enough from other Japanese-controlled islands to make it safe against Japanese land-based fighters and light or medium bombers. Since it lies on the most direct route to Japan proper, some military observers suggest that this sortie may mark the beginning of the main attack against Japan. But there is a strong possibility that it is a feint designed to draw the Japanese navy away from the Bay of Bengal or some other area in which the United Nations are preparing to strike. The secret of successful warfare lies in keeping the enemy guessing.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH CONFERENCE, WHICH met in New York City last week, registered an overwhelming vote in favor of the Zionist idea. The conference was made up of some 500 delegates elected from every section of the country. Only four voted against the resolution calling for a Jewish Commonwealth in Palestine, and these four votes seemed to indicate disagreement principally on the question of timing. The conference's spirited demand for the opening of Palestine to Jewish immigration under control of the Jewish Agency and for immediate nullification of the White Paper of 1939 reflects the tremendous increase of support for the Zionist program among American Jews as a result of events in Europe. Recent reports seem to bear out the assumption that by the end of the war no more than a million and a half—at most two million—Jews will be left alive in Europe. The delegates to the conference apparently made the further assumption that anti-Semitism has been so systematically and widely propagated by the Nazis that the Jews who survive will find it impossible to resume a normal life in Europe. Palestine, on the other hand, now offers, in their opinion, a final solution. Observers recently returned claim that with the development of the system of irrigation and hydro-electric power a million additional Jews can be absorbed into agriculture —and this in turn would open the way for a million new workers in industry. Certainly the emigration and settlement of those Jews who wish to turn their backs on Europe should be facilitated and the United Nations, acting in concert, should assume the responsibility of working out a permanent policy for Palestine which will take into account the interests and welfare of all concerned. But we cannot accept—and we think it dubious strategy for any minority to accept—the proposition that Jews will not be able to live in Europe after a war fought and won in the name of democracy and racial equality.

THE BEHAVIOR OF THE RIGHT-WING LEADERS of the Kings County American Labor Party at its recent convention in Brooklyn is vividly described by Richard Rovere in our correspondence pages this week. He draws the obvious lesson from a performance on the part of avowed liberals and democrats which was nothing short of scandalous. Mr. Rovere makes the point that the left wing would have acted no better if the roles had been reversed. What he does not say clearly enough is that it was the Communists who introduced this species of behavior into the proceedings of the A. L. P. and that they have been guilty of it day in and day out since the party's founding. We may be sure that they will exploit for all it is worth the right-wing's use of their own tactics. We hope liberals will not be misled by their crocodile tears. The behavior of the right-wing leaders in Brooklyn was inexcusable; but it does not make the left wing, which started the totalitarian infection, any the more worthy of support.

The Fifth Year

THE superstitious Hitler had no need to consult a soothsayer for evil omens as the fifth year of the war began. At midnight on August 31—four years after the opening of the war—the R. A. F. was over Berlin inflicting the heaviest attack ever suffered by the German capital. Three days later, on the anniversary of England's entry into the war, Montgomery's gallant Eighth Army poured across the narrow Strait of Messina to begin the invasion of the European Fortress. For days American and British airmen had pounded the chief communication centers of southern and central Italy. While military experts say the Italian campaign may take months, there is a strong possibility that Badoglio may surrender to prevent needless destruction. On the other side of Europe, a powerful Russian army is on the march along a 600-mile front. Hitler's invincible Reichswehr is retreating from the fabulously rich coal and iron region of the Donbas; to the north it has already given up a huge area in the Ukraine where Hitler promised to find Lebensraum for land-hungry Germans, and it looks as if a forced withdrawal to the Dnieper has begun.

Within Europe rebellion has reached an advanced stage. Denmark, hitherto relatively quiet under the German yoke, has found countless ways to express its anger at Nazi brutality. The scuttling of the larger part of the Danish navy and the escape of the remainder to Sweden must have brought home even to the German people the utter collapse of the much-vaunted "New Order in Europe." While the Germans checked further open demonstrations of Danish feeling with their customary cruelty, the manner in which General von Hanneken vacillated between ruthless repression and attempts at conciliation reflects an uncertainty never before evident in Nazi policy. In southeastern Europe, Bulgaria's future role in the war has become highly uncertain as a result of the death of King Boris. While Premier Philoff seems determined to keep his country among the Axis satellites, there are strong intimations of popular opposition to this course which might easily lead to his overthrow. Should Italy suddenly withdraw from the war, the collapse of the Balkans would probably not be long delayed. Despite all of this, it must be remembered that Hitler still controls virtually the whole of Europe. The fact that a second front has not yet been opened across the English Channel indicates the respect with which the Allied military commanders still regard the German military machine. The occupation of Italy will not weaken the Reich's military power very much. The Russian advance is potentially of greater significance; but the approach of the fall rains makes it doubtful whether a major break-through can be achieved before winter. It is still possible for Alfred Rosenberg to boast that the Ukraine is yielding millions of tons of grain to feed the German army. Although the portents are increasingly favorable, it must not be forgotten that the great battles of the war still lie ahead.

Food and Lend-Lease

WHEN Congress convenes we may expect a flood of demagogy to make it appear that the American people are going hungry, and agricultural processing industries being disrupted, to supply food for lend-lease. An advance taste of what may be expected was provided by former Governor Alfred M. Landon in a speech at Kansas City last week. Governor Landon, who managed to go through the 1936 presidential campaign without stooping to the cheaper forms of tub-thumping, seems to have lowered his standards since then. "The New Dealers," Landon told the Cooperative Club, "are proposing to take our food—our money—away from our own, and hand it over to someone on the other side of the world. And they think we should say 'thanky sir' while they are doing it." The Wall Street Journal charges that the New Deal is about to ruin the livestock industry by putting the American people on a cereal diet so more food can be sent abroad.

It would be to the credit of the American people if, at a time when other peoples are starving in the United Nations' cause, we really pulled in our belts to help feed them. But the principal reason for the supposed food shortage is that in normal times many Americans do not earn enough money to eat decently, and comparatively few can afford to feed themselves as well as Uncle Sam feeds them in the army. Increased civilian purchasing power and army requirements, rather than shipments abroad, account for most of the food stringency at a time when crops are the greatest in our history. Actually, as we pointed out in an editorial paragraph last week, we are shipping less food abroad in this war than we did in the last.

We summarize the figures given in the President's latest lend-lease report to Congress because so few papers paid any attention to them and because lend-lease food shipments are likely to be so prominent in Congressional oratory. Here is a comparison of food shipments now and then:

(000,000 Omitted)		(000,000 Omitted)
1915	$ 978	1940	$255
1916	1,085	1941	530
1917	1,331	1942	993

And here is the comparison in terms of percentage of food output exported, whether under lend-lease or for cash:

1917	16.6%	1941	5.5%
1918	20.0%	1942	8.0%
1919	24.4%	1943	11.0%

These figures should be read in the light of the fact that many Allied countries, by reverse lend-lease, are providing large quantities of food for American troops stationed on their territories.

During the first half of this year, lend-lease cut most deeply into our supplies of dry skimmed milk, (41.8 per cent), canned fish (31.4 per cent), and dried fruits (20.1 per cent). But it took only 7.7 per cent of our meat output and 0.1 per cent of our butter. The beef taken by lend-lease "was one per cent of our supply for that period, an amount equivalent to two-tenths of an ounce per week for each person in the United States." By comparison the needs of our Allies are severe, their diets at rock-bottom. Before the war, the United Kingdom produced only 40 per cent of its food needs. In the Soviet Union about 40 per cent of the most fertile crop land has at one time or another been under Nazi control. "The Nazis," the President's lend-lease report says, "now occupy for the third consecutive growing season one of Russia's greatest agricultural regions, the Ukraine. In the summer of 1942, the Nazis also overran her second great agricultural region, the North Caucasus." Americans are enjoying princely fare compared to the rations of the British and the Russians.

Britain and Russia

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

London, September 2, by cable

IN New York whenever an international crisis boils up we wonder what people in Britain are saying. And we seldom find out until the newspapers arrive from England three or four weeks later, by which time some new event has usually stolen the show.

Today Britain is talking about Russia, and I hope a report of some of its remarks will be interesting to Americans. But readers should be wary. Criticism of foreign policy, especially if it involves American foreign policy, is very restrained. Indeed, caution and politeness are carried to an extreme, and one must look under the camouflage to get an indiluted opinion.

Before getting down to details, I want to report that the reception by the press of the Prime Minister's Quebec speech was friendly but rather guarded. The Daily Herald said the public reaction would be that the powers should stop talking about meeting and meet. The Manchester Guardian also urged an early tripartite conference. The News Chronicle, welcoming Mr. Churchill's remarks as a hint that things were moving at last, said his recognition of the "paramount importance of a coordinated political policy for all the Allies" was the outstanding pronouncement of the speech. It concluded, "As things stand, there is a danger of our winning the war in the field before we have settled the broad foundations on which Europe's future must be built. That would be sheer tragedy." The Times approved the Prime Minister's statements "provided that the practical measures come up to specifications." The Worker, as might be expected, was politely gloomy, demanding both talks and a second front without further delay.

Of course the presence of Maisky in London offers hope that conversations will at least take place despite Hull's non-committal remarks yesterday. But most objective people with whom I have talked are pessimistic about basic tendencies. Some look upon America as the devil in the piece and cite the current reactionary swing as an omen of worse ills to come. But many feel that in Britain as in the United States the expectation of victory, together with the enormous industrial and military operations, have as usual planted in the saddle men who naturally operate through old-established power relationships. The most optimistic views, strangely enough, have been expressed by certain leaders of the exile governments, and their hopes are frankly based on the great and growing strength of Russia.

So much for generalizations. A few samples of recent press opinion are worth quoting. Last week's New Statesman and Nation, appearing while the Quebec conference was still in progress, discussed at some length the problems that lie just under the surface of diplomatic negotiations. It scouted the idea of a separate peace but said that Stalin, "disappointed by the military contribution of the Western democracies to the common war against Germany and estranged by their approach to the political problems of the post-war settlement, might steer the U. S. S. R. on an independent course." Those are vague if ominous words. More specifically the journal argued that the ideological aims of the war are visibly changing: as victory approaches we find the great powers looking toward a restoration of the status quo ante bellum. It reviewed the long list of deals and reactionary arrangements and declared that Stalin doubtless sees in all this a purpose to install in Europe "non-political" administrations agreeable to Britain and the United States—even including resurrection of Pétain if necessary. It sees little in the apparent attitude of Roosevelt or in the resignation of Welles to encourage hope that matters will be mended. And it mentions as a typical symptom of America's state of mind an article in the New York Times describing Washington's policy toward Russia as based on "principle" instead of on "opportunism" as in the case of the British.

Even the London Times, which speaks with vast care, has insisted upon the need for closer coordination, political as well as military, with Russia. A recent editorial, for example, points out the futility of any policy toward Germany which lacks the full assent and collaboration of Russia. There are, it says, two possible bases for this collaboration. The first would be an arrangement by which Russia and the Western powers "concert together broad measures of policy applicable, in consultation with the smaller countries concerned, to Europe as a whole. . . . The second would be an arrangement by which Britain or Britain and the United States accepted the main responsibility for the organization of security in Western Europe and Russia in Eastern Europe, each cooperating with the countries in its own sphere but each renouncing any responsibility in the appointed sphere of the other. The arguments in favor of the first solution are exceedingly strong and British and American, as well as Russian, opinion appears overwhelmingly to support it. Yet by a baffling paradox British and American action in the past few weeks has perhaps unconsciously, but no less decisively, pointed toward the second solution. A failure to secure the participation of Russia in decisions of political import in Italy might appear to justify similar decisions elsewhere being taken by Russia without consultation and thus pave the way for the division of Europe into divergent spheres of responsibility." There is dynamite concealed in those measured phrases.

And curiously the same idea is developed to a more explicit and drastic conclusion in the current issue of the left weekly Tribune. In a most challenging analysis of the Russian campaign, that journal flatly declared that Stalin has embarked on a new foreign policy. The old methods of dealing with the West and the old ambassadors appointed to carry those methods into effect have failed to bring results. In place of Maisky and Litvinov, Stalin "has sent two young tough patriotic Soviet citizens who, above all, understand Russian interests in Eastern Europe. They will be found to be something new in diplomacy. . . ." The Tribune, like the New Statesman, assumes Russia is fed up with the delay in opening a Western front, with the Darlan-Mihailovich-AMG policy, and with the threat of an anti-Soviet federation in Eastern Europe. It interprets as evidence of Russia's new line its territorial claims in the Ukraine, White Russia, and the Baltic, and the abolition of the Comintern as another step toward "a more clearly determined national policy." The new magazine, War and the Working Class, is described as a shrewdly devised means of expressing demands and views which the government is not ready officially to sponsor. The article quotes a series of statements put out by the Free Germany Committee in Moscow as indicating that the Russians instead of demanding unconditional surrender would be prepared to deal with a German government which had overthrown the Hitler régime and withdrawn behind the frontier in the East. This, says the Tribune, "is not official policy—yet." It believes that the only hope of countering this trend lies in prompt action to overcome Russian suspicions, and it proposes the following three steps: large scale military operations on the Continent coordinated with offensives on the eastern front, acceptance of Russia's territorial claims, and an end to the practice of supporting "men and cliques who have only the backing of unpopular reactionary groups."

The fear that Russia will adopt a lone-wolf role as either a nationalist or a revolutionary power or both is very general. But many people assume that Britain will prevent this catastrophe. Even officials with whom I have talked, however cautious they might be about commenting on American policy, have insisted that Britain will stick to its Russian alliance at any cost. "We live too close to the Continent," they say. They realize that European equilibrium requires Russian collaboration. The position was put very simply by a member, not of the British, but of an Allied exile government. "Russia," he said, "will take whatever it thinks it needs for its own security. Great Britain and your country know this. Why do they act as if it were not so? Why not, for a change, recognize the facts and then try to create a situation so nice and reassuring that Russia will have fewer fears, fewer suspicions, and will want less." It is so obvious that I think it will happen. I admit the obvious often has not happened. But the war has perhaps taught people what logic could not. In any case, I think a sensible policy toward Russia will be agreed upon, if only because the alternative is really a little too nasty and dangerous to contemplate.

V for Vituperation

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 2

THE Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press was pleased, but most Washington correspondents were shocked, by the President's unprecedented, ill-tempered, and unfair attack on Drew Pearson as "a chronic liar." Relations among the correspondents are generally friendly, irrespective of political differences, and there is a certain professional solidarity. Distrust of the White House is widespread, on the left as well as on the right, and many felt, as Raymond Clapper said, that "it is barely possible they are using Pearson to put the fear of God into all of us." To be called "a chronic liar" by the President is a deadly blow for any correspondent, but one can hardly take Mr. Roosevelt into court and demand that he either prove his words or eat them. It was rumored at first that Pearson's Merry-Go-Round column might be dropped from the Washington Post, and relief and admiration were widespread when its publisher, Eugene Meyer, who grows steadily more progressive, came to his columnist's defense in a vigorous editorial. The Post regarded the President's conduct as "unworthy" and "unbecoming" and "a gross libel on some fearless and necessary work done by Mr. Pearson."

Like the rest of us, Drew Pearson has made his quota of mistakes, but "chronic liar" is a strong term and the press corps has long memories. It easily recalls the many occasions on which the State Department—and the White House—has indignantly denied Merry-Go-Round stories which were later confirmed. The destroyers-for-bases deal with Britain was one of them. The $100,000,000 loan the State Department wanted to make Franco was another. Hull has been quarreling with Pearson for a long time, at least since 1938, when the Secretary publicly denounced the columnist for revealing that the State Department was permitting the sale of arms to Germany in violation of our 1921 treaty with the Reich. It can fairly be said that the State Department has chronically misrepresented to the American people the facts concerning our foreign relations, and the White House itself does not come into the controversy with clean hands. I cite the amazing statement made by the President to Congress last January 7: "Even today we are flying as much lend-lease material into China as ever traversed the Burma road"—an assertion that bewildered us and embittered the Chinese.

Much more than Pearson's reputation is involved in this affair. It has raised the most serious questions in the minds of all of us. The first and most important concerns our relations with the Soviet Union. Arthur Krock, whose staunch defense of the President and Hull in this case is amusing and significant, suggests that they attacked Pearson in order to prove their friendship for the Russians. It seems strange that the goat picked for this worthy purpose was not one of the anti-Soviet brigade but a man who has been consistently anti-fascist and pro-Soviet. An attack on anti-fascist newspapermen is certainly the feeblest alternative to a second front that has yet been suggested. Pearson called Hull anti-Soviet, and Krock says the President and the Secretary "feared the Russians might believe it, and decided to take no chances." The best that can be said of this is that it is naive. The Russians have been dealing with the State Department for a good many years, unofficially before 1933, officially since. Their personal contacts and negotiations with its members have given them far broader bases of information and judgment than anything the best newspapermen can obtain from the outside. The President certainly understands, if his Secretary doesn't, that neither Pearson's assertions nor Hull's denials are likely to affect the views of the Kremlin.

The conclusion most of us find inescapable is that the two Hull statements and the remarks of the President were intended for home consumption. While the State Department has been doing a good deal of whistling in the dark over Russian affairs, officials here are genuinely worried. They are worried over the possibility of a separate peace by a victorious Russia with a vanquished Germany, and perhaps even more over the blame that would accrue to them at home in such an eventuality. I think Hull can honestly deny that he literally wants to see the Soviet Union bled white, but I wouldn't say as much for all his advisers; and if the Russians weren't as strong as they are, they would hardly be saved from that fate by Mr. Hull's policies. But the Secretary is smart enough as a politician to realize the danger of a domestic uproar over deterioration in our relations with Russia. The left was blamed for endangering the lives of American soldiers by its inability to swallow Darlanism in North Africa. Is the Administration now maneuvering to blame the left if our relations with Russia go sour?

One of the reasons why the President and Hull may be so bitter against Pearson and other Washington correspondents who took up the defense of Welles is that both are startled by the reaction of the country to the Under Secretary's forced resignation. Neither dreamt that Welles was so highly regarded. The repercussions of the press in the United States—and in Latin America —indicate how closely Welles's fate is linked in the popular mind with the future of our Russian relations, and how much value is attached to those relations in all ranks of the population. Hull had hoped that by announcing the resignation of Welles and the appointment of his successor at the same time, he would avoid much debate. Roosevelt had hoped that by appointing Welles to a roving ambassadorship, he could similarly avoid a debate in which severe criticism of Hull was inevitable. The leak of the news to the press gravely embarrassed both Hull and the President and upset their plans so badly that although Welles's resignation was accepted on August 22, it has yet to be announced. Hull is now so angry that it is difficult for the President to give Welles another diplomatic assignment, but the clamor over Welles, on the other hand, is so great as to make it politically unwise to drop him altogether. This is the President's dilemma and the source of his annoyance.

The Pearson affair may have domestic political consequences. It is only the latest example of Roosevelt's contemptuous attitude toward those who have been his most consistent journalistic supporters; the slap at Samuel Grafton was another. Pearson is one of the few who have defended the New Deal in columns published by a long list of anti-New Deal papers. It has not been easy for him to do that, and the President's attitude toward him makes us wonder about his attitude toward the rest of us. Is he, on his present rightward course, trying to demonstrate that he has as little use for the pro-New Deal journalists as the anti-New Dealers have? Certainly he never called Mark Sullivan or David Lawrence or Arthur Krock or Frank Kent "a chronic liar" even in the days of their bitterest campaigns against him. This rift between the President and his veteran supporters will be welcomed at the State Department, where it will be taken as further evidence of Hull's political agility. Until now, Roosevelt has used the department as a lightning rod to divert public criticism of the Administration's foreign policy. Hull has now maneuvered the President into the front-line trenches, and into a head-on collision with New Deal forces.

A Peace Plan for Asia

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE Japanese have always insisted that the Western nations do not understand the peculiar ways of the East, and that a system of world organization which might keep the peace in Europe and America would not work in the Orient. This, of course, is largely nonsense. The idea was manufactured chiefly for home consumption to justify Japan's violation of all of the laws of nations. But there is just enough truth in the statement to make it worth discussion. It is perfectly clear that the concept of world citizenship is not yet understood in Japan, or in most of the vast Pacific area. And all Oriental peoples have suffered sufficiently from the white man's imperialism to distrust a system of world organization that appears to give white men continued domination.

Most of these peoples have, by now, had a taste of Japanese domination and they would probably prefer to return to Western rule. I say "probably" because there is very little real information as to what is happening in the Japanese-occupied areas. Some reports indicate that the Japanese have been fairly successful in setting up puppet governments in certain areas, and there are doubtless groups in every occupied area that would rather have the Japanese than the white man. But it is likely that a great majority of the Eastern people will be ready to help in any settlement that excludes the Japanese. For their sake as well as for our own and the future peace of the world, it is imperative, then, that Japanese military power be crushed completely. Japan, in its way, is fully as serious a problem as Germany. The military tradition is deeply imbedded in the Japanese mind. The people are readily disciplined, fanatically loyal to their Emperor, and extremely ambitious for national glory. As the most highly industrialized country in Asia, Japan will undoubtedly try again for dominance unless it is destroyed militarily beyond hope of recovery.

Fortunately Japan can be destroyed militarily without imposing fresh burdens on the Japanese people. The basis of Japan's present strength is in its empire. Its naval and air strength has been multiplied severalfold by its possession of strong and widely scattered bases in Korea, Manchuria, Formosa, Hainan, and the mandated islands of the South Seas. Korea has furnished cheap labor; Manchuria has provided much of the iron and some of the coal of Japan's newly developed armament industry; North China has some coal and iron and is a rich source of salt, cotton, and cheap man-power; while Sakhalin has been the most convenient source of oil.

Manchuria and North China are, of course, integral parts of China and should be restored in entirety to that country without any strings. Formosa is in much the same category. Although it was taken from the old Manchu Empire fifty years ago, it is inhabited almost entirely by Chinese and should be regarded as part of China. Japan's outlying island possessions, including the mandated islands, have no link to any other country. If the United Nations take these ill-gotten possessions from Tokyo and place them in more constructive hands, and destroy the Japanese navy, Japan will have lost much of its capacity to menace the peace of the world.

This will be particularly true if China is given every opportunity to develop into a world power. China has made great strides in the past twenty years. It has attained a greater degree of political unity than at any other time in modern history. Thousands of miles of modern highways have been opened up, linking the rich interior provinces with commercial towns on the seacoast. Some railways have been built, and there has been some industrial development in the far interior. By our standards, however, China is still a non-industrial country. What factories it has are chiefly devoted to textiles and light manufacturing. China has no steel industry worthy of the name and no aluminum industry; it lags behind India in its capacity to turn out the tools of war. It has fewer miles of railroad per person than any other important country in the world. If China is to be strong enough to discourage further aggressive tendencies on the part of Japan, it must receive help from the United Nations in developing a modern industry, in expanding its transportation facilities, and in reconstructing its agriculture.

China can support a modern industry only if its four hundred million peasant farmers become more productive. When we speak of increasing farm production, we are likely to think of tractors, combines, commercial fertilizers, and rotation of crops. None of these would mean much to China under present conditions. The average Chinese farm is much too small to apply the methods of large-scale cultivation used in this country, and the Chinese peasant has little to learn from us, apart from seed selection, regarding agricultural methods suitable to his small plots. Our methods of cultivation could be used only by the development of cooperative or state farms such as may be found in the Soviet Union. In many areas the Chinese farmer is desperately handicapped, however, by an archaic system of land tenure, heavy indebtedness at usurious interest rates, and lack of capital for even his simple operations. And much of China is too dry for intensive farming. Its agricultural production could be greatly increased by new irrigation projects to supplement those that have been in existence for thousands of years. United Nations assistance might well be made available also in encouraging mass education on the pattern set years ago by the American-trained Jimmie Yen, and in extending the public-health activities started by the Health Section of the League of Nations. This is an ambitious program, but there is no task facing us in the post-war period of greater importance than the strengthening of China so that it may take its rightful place of leadership in the Far East.

This does not mean that America can safely abandon all interest in Asia after we have helped place China on its feet after the war. For years before December 7, 1941, many Americans argued that we had no stake in the Far East worth fighting for, and that we should withdraw altogether. For all practical purposes, Washington accepted that argument. It did not even object strenuously when Japan took over Manchuria and North China and froze American trade out of that area by a series of special regulations. It protested the sinking of the Panay, but took no retaliatory step. It arranged to give up the Philippines. And long after it became clear that Japan had embarked on a career of aggression and conquest, we continued to provide it with vast quantities of oil, copper, scrap iron, and other sinews of war. Previously when trouble imperiling our interests threatened in the Far East, we rushed troops and warships to the scene. But in the face of Japanese aggression we withdrew our troops and marines from China and kept our so-called Asiatic fleet at token size.

Obviously, it would have been a risky policy for the United States to have stood alone against Japanese aggression during the decade from 1931 to 1941. But it would have been less risky than the futile attempt to run away from our responsibilities. For it is now evident that we had a stake in the Far East that was very much worth fighting for—a commercial stake in the oil, rubber, and tin of the East Indies, a political and strategic stake in the Philippines, and, above all, a stake in preserving the rights of weak nations lest anarchy spread over the world and engulf us in a titanic struggle against great odds.

The Nine-Power Pact was meant to keep us in Asia, and to protect the peace by joint action of all the powers. But the Nine-Power Pact had many defects. It was an imperialist instrument which assumed special rights for the foreign powers, including Japan, in China. Although it supposedly guaranteed the Chinese Republic's sovereignty and administrative integrity, the pact had no teeth and was never taken seriously by some of the signatories, notably Japan. Furthermore, although Belgium, Italy, and several other countries with minor interests in the Far East participated in the Washington Conference which formulated the agreement, the Soviet Union—which ranks as one of the greatest of the Pacific powers—was not represented.

Probably the most effective way of tackling the special problems of the East would be through the creation of a permanent Pacific council. This council would presumably function as a branch of a World Council and would have delegated authority over all matters pertaining to the Pacific. Membership in the council should be restricted to the countries having vital interests in the Pacific area. In addition to the Big Four of the United Nations—America, Britain, China, and Russia—Australia, New Zealand, India, an Indonesian federation, the Philippines, and Japan should be adequately represented. It might be found desirable to set up a separate international court for disputes originating in this region. But the foundation of peace in the Pacific, temporarily at least, must be an implemented Pacific security pact in which all of the participating nations agree, acting through a world council, if possible, to safeguard each other's territorial integrity. Ultimately, the enforcement of such an arrangement should be put in the hands of an international army, but until such an army is created the United Nations must assume the obligation.

One thing is very clear about the post-war organization of the Pacific area. The preponderance of power must rest with the Pacific peoples themselves and not with Western nations that have "interests" in the Pacific. It must, in other words, be free from the taint of imperialism. What success Japan has had in gaining the support of other Asiatic peoples has been achieved by capitalizing on the existing resentment against the white man's rule. It will doubtless be argued at the peace table, as it has been so frequently in the past, that the Western nations are more enlightened than others and that therefore they are more likely to have the welfare of the native population at heart than native rulers. This may or may not be true in parts of the Orient, but it certainly is not true of the Orient as a whole. Some form of international supervision may be necessary for years to come in Indonesia, the Pacific islands, Indo-China, and possibly Korea. But that must not be taken as an excuse for the perpetuation of white man's rule. The supervision should be in the hands of a Pacific council, in which Chinese, Indian, Australian, and Filipino influence would be predominant.

Because democracy has never gained roots in Asia, many observers exclude the peoples of the Orient from consideration in determining the final settlement. This has been possible in the past; in fact, little else has been possible. But the war has given a new sense of dignity and responsibility to the peoples of this region. They have seen the white man's power collapse because it ignored the potentialities of the common people. In China, millions of farmers and village folk have not only ruled themselves these past years but have started to build up a cooperative industry and have conducted constant guerrilla warfare against the Japanese without help from their central government. India and Indonesia have also experienced a democratic awakening. All of this is, of course, just a beginning. Large parts of Asia are still politically backward and wholly unprepared for the responsibilities of democracy. But it is vital that every step of international organization in this region give the utmost encouragement and assistance to the growth of democratic aspirations. For in Asia, as in the rest of the world, the only final guarantee of peace lies in making government policies subservient to the will of the people.

Let's Look at Labor

VII. THE OPPORTUNITY FOR LEADERSHIP

BY JULIUS HOCHMAN

LABOR is worried. The passage of the Smith-Connally Act over the President's veto last June came as a terrific shock, powerful enough to stir labor leaders into action. William Green announced soon after that the American Federation of Labor was determined to defeat every Congressman who had voted for the bill. The Congress of Industrial Organizations set up a Committee for Political Action and called upon its affiliates to prepare for the 1944 elections. Similar moves to accumulate and apply political pressure to the best effect were initiated by labor groups in a number of states and communities.

Yet, for all this activity, there is something disappointing in the lack of realization on the part of the labor movement that the Smith-Connally Act is more than an isolated incident. It is in fact the newest link in a chain of events that has been in the making for years. The very forces that put over the Smith-Connally Act are still at work. Their program embraces the nullification or dilution of the labor and social-security legislation of the past decade and has as its basic aim the destruction of the trade-union movement.

In summing up the history of the American labor movement, Selig Perlman and Philip Taft, in their "Labor Movement, 1896-1932," have this to say about the attitude of American employers toward unionism:

> To the American labor movement the conquest of the right to exist was ever its paramount problem. . . . To American employers unionism has always remained the invader and usurper to be expelled at the first opportunity. American employers were endowed by America's history with a will to power unrivaled for persistence and effectiveness by employers of other countries . . . for unionism, however conservative in its objectives, is still a campaign against the absolute rights of private property of the employer.

This attitude on the part of management prevails today, as it did in 1932. Neither the depression, nor the New Deal, nor the war, has had any effect upon our industrial totalitarians. The catastrophe of 1929 shook their self-confidence. They wavered and were uncertain for the first time in decades. But by 1933 the National Association of Manufacturers, the spokesman of totalitarian industrialism in America since the beginning of the century, was back in the fight, seeking ways and means of rehabilitating its damaged prestige. Not all employers are members of the N. A. M., of course, and many important industrialists are out of sympathy with its aims and methods. Because of the gigantic corporations that control the N. A. M., however, it sets the pace and provides the leadership for the great mass of business men and manufacturers.

American industrialism after 1929 felt the impact of antagonistic public opinion. The New Deal, in lightning succession, could enact laws that had in the past been bitterly and successfully opposed by the N. A. M. Much of this legislation was aimed at eliminating the anti-labor weapons so dear to that organization. Public opinion was behind the President, and the N. A. M. could do nothing to stop him. The next best thing was to see to it that the achievements of the New Deal should be merely temporary. To accomplish this the N. A. M., through its National Industrial Information Committee, entered upon a campaign of "public relations."

Whatever the N. A. M. does it does in a big way. As usual, experts were engaged, surveys were made, and a public-relations policy was evolved. The objective was quite simple: to identify "management" with everything good in American life and to make the public believe that any interference with the totalitarian power of industry was somehow treasonable.

THE BILL OF GOODS

America's entry into the war provided the opportunity. The need for immediate conversion to war industries and for immense expansion of industrial production was eagerly seized upon by the public-relations counselors of the N. A. M. and the great corporations as the point of vantage upon which industry's prestige could be rebuilt. All credit for the war effort was to be appropriated for industry, while the blame for any shortcomings that might arise was to be shifted to labor and the New Deal. All of the resources at the command of the N. A. M. were thrown into the effort. Labor was pictured as a selfish, arrogant group seeking only personal gain at the expense of the nation at war; the New Deal as a "bungling bureaucracy" constantly hampering "industrial genius and efficiency." Fabulous sums were and are being poured into this campaign, and the press has proved only too eager to help. As a result a picture has been created in the public mind completely out of focus with the truth.

Although the facts show that organized labor has loyally adhered to its no-strike pledge (99.95 per cent compliance), the average citizen and the average member of our armed forces believe that workers are constantly on strike. Although absenteeism has been proven to be due to many causes—most of which are the responsibility of management—millions of people throughout the country and in the armed forces are convinced that it is wilful abstention from work on the part of union labor that is slowing down production. Although organized labor has accepted a ceiling on wages in the face of constantly rising prices, while corporation profits and executive salaries are rising daily, the public at large is convinced that union workers are coining big money out of the war in callous disregard for the national need. The public's natural fear of bigness, born of its bitter experiences with trusts and monopolies, has been skilfully deflected into a fear of the growing size and influence of the trade-union movement.

Political activity has never been overlooked by the N. A. M. Continued Roosevelt majorities were disheartening to its leaders, but they accepted the election of 1942 as a victory won largely through their efforts and as a go-ahead signal to intensify their political campaign. Their success so far is damaging enough, but it is to be regarded as merely a softening-up process for the final blow. Should the N. A. M. succeed in keeping public opinion in its present temper, it will utilize the transition from war to peace-time production, with its painful problems of demobilization and dislocation, as the occasion for delivering the long-planned knock-out of the labor movement. It will by no means be a one-sided fight. Labor will not take this threat to its existence lying down. The determination of the organized employers to crush the trade unions will be matched by the unconquerable will to live that American organized labor has displayed throughout the century and a half of its existence.

Should such a battle have to be fought, the costs to the nation would be incalculable. The struggle would deal the country a stunning blow economically and would seriously interfere with the fulfilment of our obligations in the post-war world, not to mention the severe strain to which it would subject our whole social fabric. Therefore, the most vital task confronting organized labor today is to recognize the danger ahead and take steps to head off the clash before it is too late.

The winning of public opinion is the pivotal point in this task. Labor's position will remain precarious until the trade-union movement achieves acceptance and recognition by the public as a permanent and basic institution of American life. Unless labor secures this one fundamental condition, all other achievements necessarily remain in jeopardy.

The task is not impossible. The N. A. M. has not won the public to its side to the degree which its propagandists would have us believe. The average man is not yet convinced of an "all-consuming interest in the public welfare" on the part of the corporations that make up the N. A. M. On the contrary, there is discernible the resurgence of suspicion in the public mind that these groups are again angling for a strangle hold on the political and economic life of the country.

Nevertheless labor's own position with the public is not good, and this unfortunate circumstance can be changed only by positive action. There are many issues on the home front which afford labor an opportunity to serve the vital interests of the general public and to win an immediate and wide following. The first of these is inflation.

The rising cost of living affects all consumers. It is the most serious immediate problem facing all classes of the population. Congress has played politics with inflation. It has done everything possible to discredit and hamstring the Office of Price Administration and to obstruct the President's program on prices. Big business has tried to soft-pedal the issue, and the press has been neutral. Labor has a magnificent opportunity to rise to its responsibility, to become the champion and spokesman of great masses of the American public. On the basis of a broadly conceived program against inflation the labor movement could take the initiative by launching an educational campaign, by calling conferences and meetings throughout the country, and by using the machinery of the labor movement for the circulation of petitions asking Congress to take effective measures against further price rises and effect a roll-back of prices in conformity with the President's program. Millions would join with labor in demanding that Congress appropriate sufficient funds for enforcement of price regulations and elimination of the black-market scourge. Most state and city governments have thus far done nothing to compel observance of price ceilings. They should be petitioned to take immediate and effective measures to compel compliance. By a campaign of this scope labor would emerge as the recognized leader of a great public movement in the national interest.

THE POLITICAL FRONT

Despite the obvious importance of immediate issues, however, labor's principal concern must be to plan and put into effect a broad public-relations policy which would find expression in an active and extensive participation in American politics. Labor must realize that its ability to function in our complicated modern democracy is closely tied up with the functioning of our government. The greatest gains in the history of the American labor movement were achieved during the past decade. These gains would have been impossible without the social reforms embodied in New Deal legislation, without an executive branch sympathetic to the purposes of these laws and determined to enforce them, and without the evolution of the judicial attitude from the standards of the injunction era into an enlightened comprehension of modern social processes. Understanding the vital and positive link between progressive government and a progressive trade-union movement, labor must make its organized influence felt as strongly on the political front as on the industrial.

Labor cannot, however, achieve these objectives unless it enters into a permanent working partnership with other elements of the population. There is a sound basis for close relations between labor and the general public. Other groups whose aims and aspirations are not incompatible with organized labor feel the same need for legislative action. They too are concerned with preserving the social advances of the past decade and want to beat back the attacks of industrial totalitarianism. An alliance between organized labor and many of these social groups, gradually cemented by common action on vital issues, should take permanent form. A conference should be called to deal not only with immediate issues but also with broader general problems, such as the development of a post-war program that will really tackle the tremendous problems of demobilization, including adequate provision for the ten or more million men returning to civilian life, the reconversion of industry to peace-time production, and the probability of general unemployment. All the New Deal legislation of the past ten years should be surveyed and needed improvements worked out jointly.

Permanent public-policy committees might be established which would function nationally, by states, and locally. Fortunately labor has bases in practically every community in the country around which local committees could be built. Such an organization could bring an immense weight to bear at the polls if its members united in support of candidates who genuinely accepted its program. Labor could thus continue its non-partisan political policy, while rendering it far more effective by bringing many other groups within its orbit. The committees would, of course, have to be kept active between elections to see that public officials supported by them stood by their pledges. Such an approach would prove of momentous significance for the inner life of the labor movement as well as for the country as a whole. A purposeful, well-planned campaign along the lines suggested here would electrify the rank and file of the trade unions and enormously stimulate their morale.

A program of such dimensions calls for a large, professional public-relations department under expert leadership. This agency should include an extensive research staff which, among other tasks, would conduct periodic polls to determine public attitudes and test techniques. Its function would be to develop and carry out a broad, long-range program of keeping the public informed of labor's aims and aspirations in the war and post-war world. It would tell the story of labor's record as a force for democracy, its achievements in behalf of the nation in peace and in war. And, it would serve to focus attention on the really vital issues affecting public welfare. While the main emphasis should be positive, the correction of misinformation in the press and on the radio should not be neglected.

THE PROBLEM OF CENTRAL AUTHORITY

One may well ask why labor has done so little to win public sympathy. The reason lies partly in the rapid growth of trade-unionism in the last few years and partly in the organizational structure of trade unions. It should be remembered that for fifteen years before the New Deal labor could do little more than fight a disheartening series of rear-guard actions, and that even since 1933 much of its energy has been absorbed in winning the elementary right of collective bargaining and in defensive struggles to keep what it has gained. It has had to fight every inch of the way against the evasive tactics of large corporations determined to elude the provisions of the Wagner Act and other statutes designed to safeguard labor. The greater part of the trade-union movement as we know it today—nearly the whole of the C. I. O. and much of the A. F. of L. as well—is the creation of the past decade, and the unionization of most of the basic industries has occurred in little more than half that period. Moreover, this rapid expansion in numbers, power, and influence has been accompanied by a split in labor's ranks. Its strength has been drained off in a futile struggle for supremacy by contending groups.

The second major factor in the situation is the organizational structure of the unions. The average union man centers his loyalty upon the immediate organization that gives him economic security and control over his job, and that is usually his local union. The international union absorbs much less of his attention, and very little thought indeed is given to that rather remote entity, the general labor movement. Traditionally and constitutionally, the A. F. of L.—and particularly its executive council, which acts for the federation between conventions—has quite restricted powers. The autonomy of the affiliated internationals is very real and is jealously guarded. Within the C. I. O. matters are somewhat different, but not as different as may appear on the surface. Yet, if a public-relations program is to have any promise of success, it must be centrally guided and directed, adequately financed, and endowed with sufficient prestige to speak for organized labor. A way must be found to concentrate authority in this field without interfering with the essential autonomy of the affiliated unions.

A public-relations policy for labor does not mean a hastily conceived, tricky publicity campaign, based on clever catchwords. The broad, long-range strategy outlined here is designed to build a solid foundation of common understanding between labor and the general public. The nation itself will be the greatest beneficiary of such an understanding. The basis exists, awaiting only the initiative of a great, well-organized, and dynamic social force. Everything points to organized labor as that force.

[This is the seventh article of a series of eight on the problems confronting the American labor movement. The eighth will appear in two weeks.]

The Cloying Good Neighbor

BY BENJAMIN SUBERCASEAUX

Santiago de Chile, August 28

WE ALL know that it is easier to build a ship in ten days than to change a South American into a Yankee in the same length of time or teach a North American to speak Spanish. That is why I have been irritated by the standardized, mechanical, and unimaginative applications of the Good Neighbor Policy. As a South American, I have no patience with North American magazines that publish articles pointing out our virtues. I am also disgusted with the hypocritical and absurd eulogies of North America by some South Americans who believe that, in these times, it is still possible to write on this subject exclusively on the basis of courtesy, as one might praise his host's fine dinner, even though it were to induce an attack of indigestion. In short, I am so fed up with everything connected with the Good Neighbor Policy that I am almost sick of this very article as I write it.

Consequently, let me make it clear that I am not going to discuss the same old political and commercial questions which have created resentment in South America toward our northern "big brother"—who has, in the past, often conducted himself as big brothers generally do. In a world where nations are separated and joined with a facility heretofore possible only in Reno it is perfectly useless to look back, like a dog with a can tied to his tail, to acts which have now lost their meaning.

What is really important and permanent, not subject to political changes or the whim of circumstance, is the instincts and temperament of the mass of our peoples. That is the only solid, material thing upon which to build.

Hundreds of North American politicians, intellectuals, and business and professional men have suddenly become preoccupied with the Good Neighbor Policy, pressing on us a new love for which we are not prepared. In the future, the times through which we are now living will certainly be known as "The Period in Which Men Were Not Prepared for Anything."

There have never existed, perhaps, in the entire history of the world, greater material and intellectual resources than we now possess. Never have politicians been better informed, laboratories better equipped, or conditions more competently studied by statisticians and scientists. Nevertheless, the world has never known more surprises or been less well fitted to cope with unexpected problems. The great virtue of the United States has been precisely its ability to get out of trouble quickly, to improvise an admirable defense against a surprise attack. However, we all must agree that it is easier to repulse aggression than to make friends. Self-protection is a simple matter of will power, muscle, and steel; whereas friendship involves the subtleties of spiritual adaptation.

Nothing would be gained by saying that North America is an illegitimate child of England, and South America of Spain. Such assertions are no longer true. But the fact remains that, in spite of our mixed racial strains, the North American is English in many respects of which he himself is not aware, and the South American is Spanish in all things in which he prefers not to be. Probably the corruption we have both suffered in the New World has done more than anything else to bring us together; it is the chief experience we hold in common. Our good qualities separate us; our defects make us brothers.

I think I know the character of North Americans well enough to say that it is only natural and logical that we Latins should make a profoundly unfavorable impression on them. When I find myself with a North American who genuinely likes us I am ready to psychoanalyze him as an abnormal character. He is an artist or he is an amorist; he has exceptionally bad taste or exceptionally good taste; he is an apostle or a pervert. Of course, he may not belong in any of these categories; in that case, we are probably faced with an erudite fool.

All North Americans are aware that South America has color and passion, that it is primitive and overflowing with natural beauty. Thus the artist should be in his milieu. Further, South America has a warm and temperate climate; love should flourish there better than in Greenland. Thus the amorist is in his element. South America also has beggars and plenty of unwashed people with skin diseases and blemished faces. It often cultivates an artificial, elaborate, and tremendously vulgar art and literature. Thus it is a paradise for the American with very bad taste. But South America also has a marvelous indigenous art, and Spain and Portugal bequeathed it the best of their architecture; its literary and artistic leaders have won international recognition. It contains people with sculptured bodies and sensual mouths such as may be found on no other continent; its aristocracy is as fine and cultivated as any in the old societies of Europe. Thus the North American with very good taste cannot help but love our part of America.

Unfortunately, South America also has many wretched people. Most of them lie without shame. There is little sense of gratitude or honesty—treachery flourishes everywhere like a poisonous nocturnal flower. Those among us who fall into vice fall extremely low; and those who free themselves from it always climb too high and repel the rest by their virtue. In South America the people work little and drink much. We are cruelly exploited by one another and almost never respect human personality, with the result that each, in his private life, feels himself tyrannized by the others. Therefore, our continent is ideal for the apostle who would like to save a few souls and also for the pervert in search of filth to wallow in.

The average, normal North American should be and is allergic to us, as he finds out from any prolonged contact. Why? For a very simple reason that no one has yet ventured to mention: because we South Americans haven't had the slightest experience of democracy and lack the moral values which it engenders in a nation. The North American, on the other hand, is a prime example of democracy in spirit and behavior.

However, do not be deceived by what I say; do not believe that we Latins accept tyranny and love submission, or that we sympathize with régimes based on force. No, in some ways we are a thousand times freer than you, but we have a kind of freedom that creates disorder and injustice. And we love this awful liberty so much that a workman or a tramp in my particular country (in spite of what some romantic Communists say) would much rather forego the comfortable home, high salary, and numerous community diversions enjoyed in your country than accept the discipline which those things entail. In the long run the average South American would willingly do without all the advantages of North American life, provided he could go on staring at his neighbors, making fun of people, lying freely, spending his week's salary in a single night in order to feel like a prince, scattering trash all over the place, and scribbling on the first wall he comes to. In short, he would never consent to give up his personal liberty, even though it was retained at the cost of collective advantage.

This sordid but magnificent South American individualism, although it fosters the artist, makes it very difficult for governments to rule their people, for teachers to educate their students, and for the inhabitants of the North and South to understand and respect each other. You North Americans have achieved as much comradeship as is compatible with capitalism. And most (not all) of you are content. You have succeeded in cutting down injustice and suffering; you have created a kind of material and spiritual happiness which is within the reach of the majority. But from our standpoint you have renounced that basis of animal enjoyment and freedom which primitive man possessed and which we do not wish to give up at any price. You do not regret such renunciations because you were born into a world of self-controlled people. Yet, when we live among you, it appears to us that life has lost all savor and that each dawn lacks the hope and stimulation which we need to live through the day. We are like the Polynesian whom the missionary has forced to wear a shirt.

It is true that we South Americans spend our time complaining about our life, but we are much more discontented when we find ourselves obliged to live a different one. Your formula of life is logical and human enough, if one identifies "human" with "civilized." And we are on the road to ruin, judged by the standards of Western Christian civilization. Nevertheless, we are closer to the natural life in which both good and bad instincts are tolerated in eternal interplay and strife. Ours is the formula of life par excellence, every organism aspiring to a biological felicity, an artistic felicity, and, finally, a moral and rational felicity.

At present, the world is bankrupt of moral values. This is something that invites meditation. On the other hand, it does not invite an enthusiastic change from the simple life (with all the effort that complexity demands) when the result is not clear and the success of so much effort is uncertain. Especially is this true in a generous and sparsely populated continent like ours, which will permit us to enjoy, for many centuries to come, a more varied and freer life—the luxury of those who need not submit to the complications of wealth or the terrible problems, spiritual and physical, produced by overcrowding.

BURLINGAME

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Who Are the Guilty?

BY MARCELLO MAESTRO

DURING the bitter years of hunger and poverty that gave birth to fascism in Europe, many men all over the world were eager to foster and promote it. American bankers gave it financial support; industrialists in England, France, and America clamored to do business with Hitler and Mussolini. There were statesmen and diplomats who had only praise for the energy with which totalitarianism had "introduced order" in Europe. Eminent journalists extolled Mussolini as one of the most admirable political figures of the twentieth century, and laughed off Hitler as an impotent psychotic.

They did not dwell too sadly upon the sufferings of the Italian masses, nor did they plead the case of the Ethiopian people. They did not condemn the invasion of Spain by Italian and German armed forces, and they greeted with silence the monstrous crimes perpetrated by fascism against democrats and Jews.

These people are as responsible for the horrors of the past years as the fascists they espoused. But they will not be punished. Now, ironically, they are vociferous in demanding punishment for the "war criminals." Now they seek "vengeance" against the enemy nations whose leaders they succored.

Obviously, these enemy nations—Germany, Italy, and Japan—contain many individuals who countenanced the criminal behavior of their leaders. But they contain others who did not. How, then, are we to establish peace without injustice? How bring the guilty to trial without inflicting undeserved punishment upon the innocent? Newspapers and magazines carry many letters and articles telling us that the defeated nations must be punished as nations. But nations are not homogeneous units. Must everyone be punished, even those who have languished in prisons and concentration camps for years because they opposed Mussolini or Hitler?

Italy was a full-fledged, active democracy before the outbreak of the First World War. The democratic spirit of its people was genuine and deep-rooted, and tolerated no racial prejudice or discrimination. Everybody enjoyed fundamental freedoms, and social reform, cooperative enterprise, and trade-unionism were integrated with political life.

After the First World War the demand for further economic and social reforms brought a strong reaction from the privileged classes. The Fascist movement came into being, supported by big business but clearly opposed by the great majority of the people. In the 1921 elections Mussolini could not collect even 5 per cent of the votes for his party. He had, however, money and weapons. And for two years, from 1920 to 1922, he terrorized the country in an attempt to crush popular resistance. Four thousand Italians were killed, hundreds of buildings were destroyed.

In October, 1922, Mussolini became premier as a result of a military coup d'état and with the connivance of the King. The fight went on. In 1924, after the Matteotti murder, Mussolini's régime—still not a full dictatorship—was on the verge of collapse. The British Foreign Minister, Sir Austen Chamberlain, arrived in Rome on a friendly visit, which gave Mussolini enough prestige to stave off disaster. But one year later the financial situation of the dictatorship had become desperate. In December, 1925, a consortium of American bankers headed by the house of Morgan floated a loan on behalf of the Italian government. The $100,000,000 loan, at 8 per cent, enabled Mussolini to stabilize the lira and to remain in power.

By the end of 1926 Mussolini had taken full dictatorial power—crushed the opposition, filled the prisons, established concentration camps, and gagged the press. All this was hailed by American, British, and French statesmen and business men as a great accomplishment, and only indifference was accorded Italian anti-Fascists. Pius XI praised Mussolini as the "man sent by Providence." The Fascist aggression against Ethiopia was openly favored by the French government, while the British Tories did their best to prevent any measure which would seriously hamper the campaign. Mussolini's intervention in the Spanish civil war would have been impossible had not the British Foreign Office connived with Franco, Mussolini, and Hitler. No wonder that Mussolini appeared stronger and stronger in the eyes of the Italian people.

It is clear that fascism, from the start, was an international issue, Italy only the battleground. Reactionaries in all countries did their best to intrench the most despicable elements of the Italian people. In its turn, fascism did its best—through propaganda, violence, and blackmail—to eliminate everything decent in Italy and to transform all Italians into criminal fanatics. If such a result was not attained, it is to the credit of the Italian people. I do not know if, after so many years of fascism, any people could have been expected to show greater ndependence of spirit and thought than the Italian peole have exhibited lately in Milan, Genoa, and Turin.

Mussolini entered the Second World War on the side f Germany, but from the start the Italian people showed eir unwillingness to fight. Had fascism won over the ass of the Italian people to its so-called ideals, the alian armies might have had a decisive influence upon e course of the war. But Mussolini knew how the Italns felt. He never dared call to the colors more than a action of Italy's total man-power. The war was opposed y all methods: soldiers surrendered on the field; at home eople clearly showed their reluctance to cooperate with e government; sabotage and strikes spread. Thousands f people were "purged" and interned.

When the armies of the United Nations began to gain n the battlefield, the movement took a decidedly deatist turn. Speeches and statements during the last year e evidence that the Fascist régime was less and less able cope with an increasingly difficult situation. Finally, ussolini had to give up. And, significantly enough, adoglio, in order to keep the Italians in the war, was rced to dissolve the Fascist Party, to abrogate all racial d Fascist laws, to set free many political prisoners, and promise free elections four months after the terminaon of the war.

On the day of Mussolini's fall, the people of Italy ve expression to their joy. Once more, however, the democratic impulse of the Italian people was discouraged by the great powers, and an attempt was made by the British and American governments to deal with the King and Badoglio—to avoid "chaos and anarchy," it was said.

Any genuine anti-Fascist must feel closer in spirit to those millions of Italians who never accepted fascism than to the "neo-anti-Fascists" of today—those statesmen, clergymen, bankers, and journalists who for a decade and a half had only praise for the great accomplishments of the Duce and contempt for the "disorderly" Italian nation of the pre-Mussolini era. Any genuine Italian anti-Fascist will approve the most severe punishment of the Fascist hierarchy and of leading Fascists abroad. He will reject collaboration with the minor Fascist authorities with whom the Allied Military Government is so eager to deal in Sicily.

But to punish the millions of Italians who were the victims not only of Mussolini but of the "pro-Mussolini" vogue in the Allied countries would constitute an absolute denial of justice. To be sure, Italy must be disarmed, and the United Nations are entitled to maintain military control over Italian territory until disarmament becomes an accomplished fact. No sensible Italian will resent this measure provided military control over Italy is limited to the strictly necessary period and the United Nations do not establish an unjust rule of their own.

Reprinted from Punch, London

"And this evening there'll be a meeting of the Post-Diluvian Planning Committee on the after-deck."

There is no danger of a recurrence of fascism in Italy if the Italians are left to themselves. A democratic republic would probably be the choice of the majority. Should, however, the American and British governments try to prevent the Italian people from finding their own way, should they try to set up a reactionary régime, we may see an exasperated Italian people turning to communism as their only alternative.

The story of the war criminals did not begin in 1939 or 1940. It began in the twenties, and some of its protagonists were men who now boast of their democracy as if by so doing they could wipe off the record the support they once gave to fascism. It will be impossible to administer justice to all of them. But it should be in the power of the peoples of the United Nations to see that punishment is meted out to the Fascist leaders, and not to the helpless masses that have suffered under them.

BY ARGUS

THINGS are never what they seem. When Maisky and Litvinov went home and unfriendly words passed between Russia and its allies, it was to be expected that the German propaganda machine would make the most of the friction. "Disunity among the Allies" has always been one of its favorite themes—but now it has turned about-face! The German people are being told that the apparent disunity is only a trick to deceive them. As the Berlin Börsenzeitung put it on August 10:

> The alleged tension between the plutocracies and their Bolshevik ally looks suspicious to us; particularly suspicious is the apparent candor of their discussions about it. The motive of the whole thing is to make the European nations believe that the plutocrats, in the event of their victory over Germany, will check Bolshevism.

No, says the paper, they will not check Bolshevism.

This new twist of German propaganda, already briefly noted here, is made more emphatic every day. Goebbels apparently believes he has now discovered his best "line." In this country we should understand the reason for the new tune. It is well known that the German public is alarmed by nothing so much as by the possibility that Germany will be occupied by Russians or Bolsheviks, the two words being interchangeable. The Germans have a traditional horror of being Russianized, since for centuries they have considered the Russians an inferior race; and now they have in addition a horror of being Bolshevized. This is the source of what a Swedish newspaper calls an increasingly evident "wave of Anglophilia." England, and to a lesser extent the United States, are regarded as saviors from Bolshevism. The burden of Goebbels's new line, endlessly reiterated, is that any hope of salvation from these nations is illusory, since t Russianization or Bolshevization of Germany has alrea been agreed upon by London, Washington, and Mosco

There is general agreement among observers in Ge many on the phenomenon of "universal Russophobia paralleling the universal Anglophilia. The Swiss Appe zeller Zeitung, for example, said on August 3:

> It is revealing how uniform the general attitude toward Bolshevism is. Propaganda and descriptions by returning soldiers have endowed Bolshevism with terrifically distorted features. . . . The opinion is frequently expressed that it would be preferable to kill one's whole family rather than deliver it to the Bolsheviks.

And the Berlin correspondent of the Stockholm Ti ningen wrote on August 7:

> The army youth brought up in the spirit of Hitlerism, and very large sections of the population, particularly the middle class, live in constant fear of Bolshevism. It might even be said that this fear is clearly expressed by the unwillingness of many Berliners to evacuate the city eastward.

This aversion, this fear, is by far the strongest weap of the Nazis in their fight against defeatism. There hardly any need for them to propagandize against Russ they now propagandize against the hope that the weste enemy will protect them from the eastern. They are co centrating their fire against this hope.

The News Mirror, the most popular German rad program of national scope, presented on August 19 report of a conversation with a fictitious person who w described as naive and a fool:

> He closed his eyes to the Bolshevik threat and assured me that England and the United States would never permit a Bolshevik conquest of Germany. I could not help asking him how England and the United States could prevent such a development even if they wanted to. . . . But once again it has been proved that England and the United States have no objection to handing Germany and Europe over to the Bolsheviks. Their reasons are clear: they are not in a position to prevent it, and they do not want to prevent it.

And Gauleiter Wagner told a meeting at Freibu on August 15:

> It is completely wrong to assume that, if Germany and its allies were defeated, the democracies would be the victors. If Germany is defeated, the victors will be the Bolsheviks, not the democracies. Only the dullest fools can fail to realize this.

All these quotations give an idea of the point of vi the Nazis are trying to sell the Germans now. Obvious they are preparing their people, in the event of defe to surrender to the English and Americans, but not the Russians.

THE JEWISH WIFE

BY BERTOLT BRECHT

English version by ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

THE scene is laid in Germany soon after Hitler came to power. It is evening. A woman is packing a bag. She is picking out the things she wants to take with r. Sometimes she takes an article out of the bag again and ts it back in its place so that she can pack something else. e hesitates a long time over a large picture of her husband ich is on the dressing-table. In the end she leaves it where is. Getting tired of packing, she sits for a few moments a suitcase, her head propped on her hand. Then she goes the telephone.

THE WIFE. Judith Keith speaking. Is that you, doctor, w are you? I just wanted to call up and say that you must k around for a new bridge partner. Yes, I'm going away. , not for very long, but it won't be less than a couple of eks. I'm thinking of going to Amsterdam. Yes, the spring uld be lovely there. No, friends, in the plural, unbeliev- e as it sounds. How can you play bridge now? But we en't played for two weeks. Certainly, Fritz had a cold . When it gets so cold bridge is impossible, I said so too. no, doctor, how could I? Thekla had to accommodate mother. I know. How should I suppose that? No, it lly didn't come suddenly at all, it's just that I kept put- it off, but now I must. Yes, we'll have to call off our vie date. Say hello to Thekla for me. Perhaps you'll call sometime Sunday? So long then. Well, gladly, of course. odby.

udith Keith speaking. I'd like to speak to Frau Shoeck. te? I wanted to say a quick goodby, I'm going away a time. No, I'm quite well, I just want to see a couple new faces. Yes, what I wanted to say was that Fritz is nging the professor here for the evening next Tuesday, perhaps you could come too. As I said I'm leaving to- ht. Yes, Tuesday. No, I only wanted to say I'm going y tonight, that has nothing to do with it, I thought you ld come then too. All right, let's say: although I'm not e, O. K.? Of course I know you're not like that, and if you were these are troubled times, and everybody's ful now. You'll come then? If Max can? Oh, he will be to, the professor'll be here, tell him. I must hang up . Fine. Goodby.

that you, Gertrud? This is Judith. Sorry to disturb you. nks. I wanted to ask you if you can look after Fritz, I'm g away for a couple of months. I think that you as his r— Why wouldn't you like to? But there's no likelihood of not in Fritz's case. Naturally he knows that—er—you and dn't get on too well together, but— Then he'll call you, u wish it. Yes, I'll tell him. It's all pretty much in order, though the apartment's a bit too big. His study? Oh, Ida knows how to look after it, just leave that to her. I find her quite intelligent, and he's used to her. And another thing, please don't misunderstand me, he doesn't like to talk before dinner, could you remember that? I've always avoided it. I don't want to discuss it now, my train leaves soon and I've not finished packing, you see. Look after his suits and remind him he has to go to the tailor—he's ordered a coat—and take care that his bedroom's well heated, he always sleeps with an open window and it's too cold. I don't believe he should "become inured" to it, but now I must stop. Thank you so much, Gertrud, and we'll write to each other. Goodby.

Anna? This is Judith. Look, I'm leaving right away. No, it has to be, it'll be harder later on. Too hard? Yes, no, Fritz doesn't want it, he knows nothing, I have simply packed. I don't think so. I don't think he'll say much. It's simply too hard for him, I mean outside. We've agreed on nothing. We never even spoke about it, never. No, he was not different, on the contrary— I want you to be good to him a little at the first. Yes, especially Sunday, and advise him to move. The apartment is too big for him. I'd like to say goodby to you, but you know— The janitor? Goodby then, no don't come to the station, by no means. Goodby, I'll write. Surely.

(She hangs up and calls no more numbers. She has been smoking. She now burns the little book in which she looked up the telephone numbers. She walks up and down a couple of times. Then she begins to speak. She is trying out the little lecture which she wishes to give to her husband. One sees that he is in a certain chair.)

Yes, I'm going now, Fritz. Perhaps I've stayed too long already, you must forgive that, but—

(She stands thinking and begins again.)

Fritz, you shouldn't keep me here any longer, you can't do it. It's obvious that I'll be your undoing. I know you're not cowardly, you're not afraid of the police—but there are worse things than the police. They won't take you to the concentration camp but—tomorrow or the next day—they won't let you into the clinic. You won't say anything then, but you'll be sick. I won't see you sitting around here turning the pages of the newspaper. I'm going out of pure egoism and nothing else. Don't say anything.

(She stops again. She starts again.)

Don't say you're not changed. You are! Last week you found—quite objectively—that the percentage of Jewish scientists is after all not so great. It always begins with objectivity. And why do you continually say to me now that I never was such a Jewish nationalist as now. Naturally I am! It's so catching! Oh Fritz, what has happened to us?

(She stops again. She starts again.)

I didn't tell you I wanted to go and have wanted to go a long time because I can't talk when I look at you, Fritz. What is wrong with them? What do they actually want? What do I do to them? I've never meddled in politics. Was I for Thaelmann? No. I'm just a bourgeois, a housewife who keeps servants and so forth, and now suddenly only blonds can carry on that way. I've often thought lately how you said to me some years ago: "There are valuable people and less valuable people. The valuable people get insulin when they have sugar in the blood, the less valuable get none." I agreed with you, little fool that I was! Now they've made a new dictionary, and I belong to the less valuable. It's right that it should happen to me.

(She stops again. She begins again.)

Yes, I'm packing. You mustn't act as if you hadn't noticed it in the last few days. Fritz, everything is tolerable except one thing: that we're not looking each other in the eyes during the last hours that remain to us. That they shall not achieve—the liars who set everyone lying. Ten years ago when someone maintained that no one could tell I was Jewish you quickly said: "Oh, yes, they can tell." And I liked that. It was clear-headed. Why evade the issue now? I'm packing because otherwise they'll take away your position at the clinic. And because they already cut you there to your face and because already you can't sleep at night. I don't want you to tell me not to go. I'm going in a hurry because I don't want to have you tell me I should go. It's a question of time. Character is a question of time. It lasts for a certain length of time, just like a glove. There are good ones that last a long time. But they don't last forever. Of course I'm not angry. And yet: I am. Why should I always be so understanding? What's wrong with the shape of my nose and the color of my hair? I should quit the town where I was born lest they should need to give me butter? What kind of men are you all? What kind of a man are you? You people discover the quantum theory and let yourselves be led by half-savages; you may conquer the world and not be able to have the wife you want. Artificial respiration and every shot a hit! You're monsters or the bootlickers of monsters. Yes, this is unreasonable of me, but what use is reason in such a world? There you sit watching your wife pack and say nothing. The walls have ears, don't they? And you say nothing! One lot listens and the other lot doesn't speak. Christ! I too should refuse to speak. If I loved you, I'd not speak. I love you really. Give me that underwear. Those have sex appeal, I'll need them. I'm thirty-six, that's not so old, but I can't do much more experimenting. It mustn't be this way in the next country I come to. The next man I get must be allowed to keep me. And don't say you'll send money, you know you can't. And you shouldn't act as if it were for four weeks. This business doesn't last a mere four weeks. You know it and I know it too. So don't say, "Well, it's only for two weeks or so," as you give me the fur coat which I'll not need till winter. And don't talk to me about misfortune. Talk about shame. Oh, Fritz!

(She stops. A door is heard. She hastily puts herself to rights. Her husband comes in.)

THE HUSBAND. What are you doing, tidying up?

THE WIFE. No.

HUSBAND. Why are you packing?

WIFE. I want to go.

HUSBAND. What do you mean?

WIFE. We've talked sometimes about my going away for a time. Things are not too good here these days.

HUSBAND. That's a lot of nonsense.

WIFE. Shall I stay then?

HUSBAND. Where do you intend to go?

WIFE. To Amsterdam. Away from here.

HUSBAND. But you have no one there.

WIFE. No.

HUSBAND. Why don't you stay here then? You certai mustn't go on my account.

WIFE. No.

HUSBAND. You know I've not changed, don't you, Judit

WIFE. Yes.

(He embraces her. They stand, silent, between the bag

HUSBAND. And there's nothing else to make you go?

WIFE. You know the answer to that.

HUSBAND. Perhaps it isn't so stupid. You need a breath I'll bring you back. Two days on the other side of the fro tier, and I'll feel much better.

WIFE. Yes, by all means.

HUSBAND. This business here can't last too long. A co plete change will come—from somewhere. All this will ca down again like an inflammation. It's really too bad.

WIFE. It certainly is. Did you meet Shoeck?

HUSBAND. Yes, that is, only on the stairs. I believe h sorry again that they cut us. He was quite embarrassed. the long run they can't hold us intellectual beasts of burc down like this. Nor can they make war with completely spi less wrecks. These people are not so unresponsive if c confronts them boldly. When do you want to go?

WIFE. Quarter past nine.

HUSBAND. And where shall I send the money?

WIFE. General delivery, Amsterdam, perhaps.

HUSBAND. I'll get myself a special permit. My God, I ca send my wife away with ten marks a month! What a m everything is in. I feel awful about it.

WIFE. When you come for me, it'll do you good.

HUSBAND. To read a paper for once that has someth in it!

WIFE. I called up Gertrud. She'll look after you.

Blind Anger

BETWEEN TEARS AND LAUGHTER. By Lin Yuta
The John Day Company. $2.50.

WE HAVE learned to respect and appreciate] Yutang as a kind of Wise Man from the E Beginning with "My Country and My People," in wh he interpreted Chinese culture for the West, he expoun a philosophy which in our Western tradition would be cal Epicurean but which he defined as a combination of Con cian and Taoist viewpoints. He gloried in the earth-bou and sober common sense of Confucianism and poured scorn upon the heaven-storming fanaticisms of the West

Perhaps he intended the same spirit to permeate his r book, for we are told that the Chinese title, literally tra ted, means "weeping, laughter, both wrong." But the gedies of the war have long since drawn him out of his rtly Epicurean and partly Stoic equanimity. There is little this volume of the "law of measure" which the title tokens. The fact is that Mr. Lin is very, very angry. Anger ay, on occasion, distil more wisdom than serenity does; the thor's anger is therefore no explanation of the fact that is book will add nothing to his reputation or stature. It is rident in tone, sometimes cheap in expression, full of conadictory opinions, and lacking in both nobility of spirit d significant illumination of the problems under discussion.

The cause of the author's wrath is fairly clear, though not all clearly defined. The cause is the white man's pride. It not clearly defined because Mr. Lin alternately accuses the estern world of arrogance, of power politics, of "matealism," and of undue reliance upon science. Since the rogance of Western man is undoubtedly one of the chief zards to the creation of a world community in which the siatic peoples can find their rightful and due place, one ay well regret that the author's anger has not found a more fective vehicle, and that he allows absurdities and contractions to destroy the force of his accusation.

When indicting the West Mr. Lin is never quite certain hether he wants to include the whole West or whether he aiming primarily at Britain, while claiming America as an ly. Mr. Churchill is his chief whipping boy. The Prime inister's intransigence on the issue of the freedom of India akes him a natural and proper object of attack. Sir Norman ngell falls under his condemnation less plausibly; and he ever adequately or justly defines Sir Norman's approach to orld problems. Though he seems at times to regard America essentially free of the prejudices which arouse his scorn, speaks at other times as if the late Professor Spykman's American Strategy in World Politics" were the definitive proach of our country to world problems.

Spykman offers a good foil for the author's charge that e West plays power politics. "I remember," he declares, during World War I the term 'power politics' used to be ritten Machtpolitik and had a German flavor; now it is not ecessary, Germany has conquered from within." Against the Western realization that all politics is power politics, in the nse that political life is never a purely rational accommoation of interest to interest but a dynamic harmony of vital rces, Mr. Lin presents Confucian moralism as the answer the problem of a global community. I seem to remember at in his "My Country and My People" he admitted that l the Confucian words of advice to the powerful did not sure justice. The simple moralism in this book throws no ght on how the world is really to be organized justly.

Furthermore, when it suits his purposes, he easily discards e picture of the pure morality of the East in contrast to e cynical devotion to power politics of the West, and reatens us with force in the following terms:

> The only logical way to keep Asia down permanently would be to keep the knowledge of the use of rifles and guns from the Asiatics, as we are trying to keep the American bombsight from the enemy. Stretch it across the decades and you know it cannot be done. For a century the discrepancy in arms alone maintained the white empires in Asia. What the Second World War suddenly revealed

A new novel by

ROBERT PENN WARREN

"One of the very few serious American novels I have read since we entered the war . . . It is full of interesting characters, some of them new to contemporary fiction. Its background . . . is freshly observed and convincing . . . It is full of surprises for the reader; some of the passages are better written than anything else in recent fiction."

—MALCOLM COWLEY, The New Republic

"AT HEAVEN'S GATE achieves a combination of intelligence and narrative pace all too rare in contemporary fiction. For Warren has worked the tragic symbols of the Southern mind into a fast and highly charged story of the South . . . And in the present state of the novel, AT HEAVEN'S GATE has the special value of demonstrating that unconsciousness is not a prerequisite for the writing of fiction."

—WILLIAM PHILLIPS, The Nation

"Mr. Warren has provided in AT HEAVEN'S GATE not only a stirring novel but one of the most profound interpretations that has yet been made of Southern life."

> is that now the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Russians have guns. This fact is going to change world history.

I think that the observation is true and the implied threa justified. But it stands in strange contradiction to the monotonous indictment of "power politics" in the rest of th volume. The real fact is that the author has never meditate very profoundly on the relation between power and justic and how to make the former a servant of the latter.

One of his charges against the West is that it trust science too much. It is not quite clear whether his case agains science is that it makes value judgments on the basis c inadequate criteria, or that it fails to make such judgment or that it is incapable of measuring the "imponderables" c human life. A very plausible indictment against Wester confidence in science can be written; but it would have t be made with more discrimination than the author reveal

Among many other vagaries in this disjointed diatrib against the West is the idea that experts are interested onl in facts, while the common people have a sure hold o "principles." This charge becomes particularly implausibl when applied to foreign policy. Most of the national policie against which he inveighs were forced upon statesmen b the reluctance of ordinary citizens to assume responsibilitie for political order and justice beyond their own nation an by the inability of the common man to foresee coming event

We shall just have to write off this book and hope tha the author will regain his poise in the future. If he is goin to write about politics, he might well study a little politic science, however hateful scientific discipline may seem t him.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Sweden's Dilemma

STALWART SWEDEN. By Joachim Joesten. Doubleda Doran and Company. $2.50.

THE Sweden Joachim Joesten first went to "was a happ care-free land," he says. That was in 1934, long befo the days of war, which have shown Sweden that the neutral lot is not a happy one. Neutrals are disturbed from withou and within. The belligerents prod them. They suffer psychological mutations because they pretend to stand upon th moon while they try to live in the world. Neutrality nurture a sort of introversion accompanied by anxious self-questioning. Is neutrality honorable? Is neutrality wise?

Now Mr. Joesten adds to the store of unhappiness fo neutral Sweden by setting out to show that throughout th war the country has been an unneutral thorn in the Allie side. "Up to the end of last year," Mr. Joesten writes in h little book, "I was convinced that Sweden, if forced into th war, would side up with Germany."

His conclusion had an especial interest for me because no long ago I was in Sweden trying to assay its point of view My opinion on leaving was that the Swedes fundamentall were pro-Allied but had been disillusioned and mad timid by international political events. In the years betwee wars they had sought a system of cooperation among a powers great and small, in the form of the League. Ethiopi Spain, and Munich discouraged them, and today they mak inward reservations when faced with arguments about th oral earnestness of what they call the "Great Powers."

I thought Mr. Joesten's book might convince me I was rong about the Swedes and that I would discover they really e pro-German. The evidence he gets into his book does ot make a case. He devotes a long chapter to Axel L. enner-Gren as a friend of Germany, but Wenner-Gren as been out of Sweden since the war's beginning and he is sliked among his fellow Swedes. He does not influence veden's war-time policies from his safe retreat in Mexico.

Mr. Joesten stresses the censors and newspaper publishers ho appear to help Germany, but the press in the main is o-Allied. The newspaper with the largest circulation, the ockholm Dagens Nyheter, is anti-German. Stockholm apers carry more American news than British papers. He arges that Sweden is unfair to anti-Germans who are seekg asylum because he was put into an internment camp in 940 when he was discovered traveling without papers under n assumed name, but Stockholm is filled with Czechs, Ausians, Poles, and Norwegians who have found refuge there.

The events leading up to Mr. Joesten's internment occupy good many of his 205 pages. He has a grievance against weden, and his book might have been more telling if he ad given the grievance less emphasis. He adds a good deal the existing lore concerning German fifth-column activities. ut he weakens his case again by stressing the essential curent pro-Germanism of Swedes related by ancestry or marage to Germans. Mr. Joesten himself was born a German, nd he has shown that nobody can be more anti-German an a German.

hildren under Fire

AR AND CHILDREN. By Anna Freud and Dorothy T. Burlingham. Medical War Books. $3.50.

THOUSANDS of Americans were genuinely moved by the motion picture "Journey for Margaret." Undoubtdly many among them sensed, even in the very popular ortrayal of the work of the English nursery, something of s special quality. The nursery shown was intended to depict ne of three operated by the Foster Parents' Plan for War hildren under the direction of two highly trained psycholoists, Anna Freud, daughter of Sigmund Freud, and Dorothy iffany Burlingham, an American child-analyst. "War and hildren" is their own presentation of their work and the heory behind it.

Convinced that emotional shocks and deprivations are uite as serious a threat to the child's normal development s dietary deficiencies or bodily dangers, these women have nade unusual efforts to meet the psychic needs of their harges and to repair the damage already done.

Their trained awareness of this aspect of the war problem ends a unique value to their observations of the actual beavior of children and parents and to their deeply thoughtul commentary. One might add, parenthetically, that it is efreshing and somewhat unusual to find the parents recogized throughout as human beings whose problems and conlicts were increased by the abnormal situation, and who eeded help and consideration if their children were to be enefited.

HAVE YOU DISCOVERED

Kierkegaard?

Of course you know his name, but have you read him? Soren Kierkegaard has been soberly compared to Socrates, Pascal, Nietzsche, Tolstoy, Augustine, Freud, Tertullian, and William James (to give only part of the list).

TIME MAGAZINE: "Had this philosopher and mystic not written in a minor language, his fame would have resounded with that of Carlyle, Nietzsche, and Dostoevski."

MIGUEL UNAMUNO: "I learned the language in order to read Ibsen and was rewarded by reading Kierkegaard."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR: "The profoundest interpreter of the psychology of the religious life, in my opinion, since St. Augustine."

COMMONWEAL: "The greatest Protestant Christian of the nineteenth century, a man equal in spiritual stature to Cardinal Newman."

CHRISTIAN CENTURY: "Kierkegaard has inspired all those philosophers and theologians of the recent past who have concerned themselves with the doctrine of man."

These are the ten Princeton Kierkegaard publications:

Small children, the authors point out, are very little affected by repeated bombing experiences, provided they are in the care of their mothers or trusted mother substitutes at the time. "But it is a widely different matter when children are separated from or even lose their parents." If, on the other hand, the parents themselves are unusually agitated and upset, their fears are communicated to their children, even to very young babies incapable of understanding speech or appreciating the dangers around them. "The war acquires comparatively little significance for children," we are told, "so long as it only threatens their lives, disturbs their material comfort, or cuts their food rations. It becomes enormously significant the moment it breaks up family life and uproots the first emotional attachments of the child within the family group. London children, therefore, were on the whole much less upset by bombing than by evacuation to the country as a protection against it."

Why this was true, what measures might be taken to safeguard children's mental health when evacuation is necessary, how these particular nurseries attempted to meet the problem for the children in their care, and how they assisted in the rehabilitation of children already harmed by evacuation experiences are some of the very practical matters discussed.

The vital importance of the mother relationship is stressed again and again. The authors are convinced that every effort must be made to keep it alive. Repeated temporary upsets due to the partings following visits are found much less dangerous than the apparent calm of complete separation.

A discussion of considerable theoretic interest probes the meaning of these experiences for children at various ages and levels of psychological development. Regression or—in younger children—complete failure to repress early aggressive and instinctual drives is linked with disturbance of the mother relationship at a time when the child's struggle toward civilized standards is still dependent on love for the parent. There is also an important note on the disturbance of this civilizing process due to contact with adult aggression and destructiveness. "The real danger," we are reminded, "is not that the child, caught up all innocently in the whirlpool of the war, will be shocked into illness. The danger lies in the fact that destruction raging in the outer world may meet the very real aggressiveness which rages in the inside of the child. At the age when education should start to deal with these impulses, confirmation should not be given from the outside world that the same impulses are uppermost in other people. Children will play joyfully on bombed sites and around bomb craters . . . but it becomes impossible to educate them toward a repression of, and reaction against, destruction while they are doing so."

Space forbids any attempt to reproduce all the important insights of these authors. The book should prove fascinating reading for all who are concerned about children in war time. While eminently sound and thoughtful, it is brief and free from forbidding psychological jargon. One wishes it had been more carefully edited to eliminate repetitions and occasional grammatical errors. But these are minor flaws in an otherwise excellent piece of work. HELEN G. STERNAU

ME people, I find, think that Mr. etrillo is forbidding the record anies to manufacture copies (cor- nding to photographic prints) of ecordings (corresponding to photo- hic plates or films) already in exist- . Actually he is forbidding members is union to accept employment by ompanies to make new recordings. s doing this as an act of pressure— tly on the record companies, in- tly on the broadcasting and juke- companies—to secure an agreement will protect the living musician nst the machine—an agreement that increase the employment of living icians and compensate those thrown of work who cannot be reemployed. s far as I can judge, the pressure is effective, and the action is hurting employed musician without doing unemployed the slightest good. The rd companies cannot record per- nances of symphonic and other ssical" music; but all this means is they are saving the expense and ble involved in new recordings while devote their plant, materials, and r to manufacturing copies of already ting recordings of such music in ntities which do not even remotely e near meeting the demand; and can go on doing this until record- is resumed in Europe and they begin eceive a fresh supply of new record- . They cannot record performances the latest popular songs; but again means that they save the expense trouble involved, and that they ufacture more records of "classical" ic which sell for 75 cents and a dol- and less records of popular music ich sell for 35 cents and 50 cents. large broadcasting systems continue roadcast the living performances of phony orchestras and celebrated jazz ds. The small broadcasting stations ch depend on records continue with existing recordings of symphony hestras and celebrated jazz bands— ugh one can foresee that their audi- es may tire of the recordings of the popular songs, and that as a result re may be pressure on the stations ome to terms with Mr. Petrillo. The e pressure may be even greater on manufacturers of juke-boxes, which only records of popular songs. The ll broadcasting stations and juke-box npanies may, then, be hurt—to what ree, and with what effect for Mr. rillo's purpose, I don't pretend to know; but meanwhile the members of symphony orchestras and jazz bands are losing the money they would be earning at recording-sessions, the symphony orchestras are losing the royalties they would be receiving from the new recordings, the song-writers and the arrangers are losing their royalties, and when the juke-box companies begin to be hurt the celebrated jazz bands whose popularity is built up in large measure by the records in juke-boxes will begin to be hurt with them.

In a recent letter to the New York Times Sir Thomas Beecham questioned whether Mr. Petrillo's action was a good way to achieve his end, and suggested a better way. Accepting Mr. Petrillo's statement that his quarrel was not with the record companies but with the broadcasting and other companies that "live partly or mainly upon mechanized music to the disadvantage of unemployed musicians," Sir Thomas suggested that the protection of copyright be extended to records, so that these companies, which now can use them without paying anything, would have to pay a fee for each use. "A very large income would be forthcoming to the creators, artistic and mechanical, of the records. They, I am sure, would be only too willing to hand over to the [musicians' union] the larger portion of [the] fees." And the union could use the money for unemployment relief or to create employment: "Why should not the Federation . . . found orchestras of its own?"

On the same page a week later a Mr. Herbert A. Speiser pointed out that "when [the musician] makes a record he creates a substitute for his services and so dispenses with the need for his own employment"; and went on to show that the musician who made this record was not fairly compensated for his work. "If I am asked by another to grant him the use of something which I have created, I inquire into what the use is and how much money he will make. If I find he will profit $100 I will ask a fee of, say, $10. But if he will profit $1,000,000, should I receive but the same $10?" That, wrote Mr. Speiser, was the situation of the musician, who was paid a fair fee for making a record intended to be played in the home, but who was unable to collect anything out of the huge profits which the broadcasting stations and juke-box companies made out of it, because of the federal copyright law passed thirty-four years ago which protects the author, the composer, the inventor, but not the performer. Attempts to amend the law have been defeated by "the pressures of strong economic influences, among which are the very interests which gain the fabulous profits from the use of musicians' talents on records. The public interest, if considered, was lost in the lobby. Now that the musicians have taken an aggressive and brave stand, Congress talks suddenly of the public and wastes its time on investigations of the rights of A. F. of M. and its energetic leader. If Congress has the public interest at heart, the remedy is clear and simple—give the musician the same protection of the law which every other creator has."

And a week later, on the same page, an article by Jack Gould gave Mr. Petrillo's views on the matters discussed in the preceding letters. He too believed that the copyright law should be extended to recorded performances, and that this would make possible a long-range solution of the problem; but he contended that a short-range solution was necessary meanwhile because previous attempts had demonstrated the difficulties in the way of getting the copyright law revised and the time this would take. Each such attempt had been defeated by the quarreling of the parties involved, of whom the record companies and the musicians' union were only two among a larger group. Only recently Mr. Petrillo had offered the companies a combination of long-range and short-range solutions: his cooperation in an attempt to secure revision of the copyright act, if over a period of five years the companies would make payments to the union totaling $18,000,000; and the offer had been rejected by the representatives of the broadcasting companies, who had both negative and positive reasons for opposing both the short- and the long-range solutions—who, that is, had not been hurt financially by the Petrillo ban, who did not want to pay $18,000,000, and who did not want a revision of the copyright law which in the long run would compel them to pay far more than $18,000,000 in increased royalty fees.

This discussion in the Times has caused the problems, the issues, the possible solutions, the forces working for and against these solutions to emerge clearly defined from the previous confusion. But the comment they call for will have to wait until next week.

Is This Clean Politics?

Dear Sirs: Simple honesty should be the basis of liberal and labor politics. Our quarrel with the right and with totalitarianism is, in large measure at least, ethical. If we are to work for more democracy—in politics, in economic life, in world affairs—our own democracy must be above reproach.

I am moved to these remarks by a scandalous violation of democratic procedure in an organization dedicated to social progress and clean politics. On August 30 I attended, as a duly elected county committeeman, the 1943 convention of the Kings County (Brooklyn) American Labor Party. The ostensible purpose of the meeting was to elect officers and name candidates. Actually, as every party member knew, the meeting was to be a final test of strength between the two leading factions, known generally as the right and left wings. The left wing consists of those who have followed a political line parallel to that of the Communist Party and have unfailingly urged current Communist policies upon the A. L. P. The so-called right wing, to which I adhere and on whose ticket I was elected in the primaries, is held together less by any political line than by its opposition to the left wing; we feel that left-wing control of the party would mean Communist domination pure and simple and that all hope for liberal political action in New York State would die.

That, roughly speaking, was the issue. The primaries had been so close that no one could tell which side had won. The right-wing leaders, who control the party machinery, called the convention and examined all credentials. When they determined that a quorum of accredited committeemen was present, they declared the session open.

What followed was outrageous. From the moment the first viva voce vote was called, it was clear that the left-wing was a large majority. Even those with a high regard for Communist lungpower could not claim that the right wing outnumbered the left. Yet John Gelo, chairman of the convention, had the audacity to award the decision to his followers. And so it went all evening. The left wing roared and the right wing squeaked, but the chairman, who had refused to permit the Honest Ballot Association to send a representative, always found his side in the majority. Left-wing representatives got the floor only by taking it without permission. During the whole evening, only one of their motions was entertained—then "voted" down by Mr. Gelo's followers. The rest of the time they could not even raise a point of order or a point of information. On the only hand-vote of the evening—on a new slate of county officers proposed by the left wing—my side was outnumbered three or four to one. At least so it seemed to me, sitting up in an advantageous seat in the balcony. So it seemed to everyone about me, of both persuasions. So it seemed to all the newspapermen and police present. Certainly the left had more than half the votes. After refusing to allow any left-wing members to act as tellers, Mr. Gelo calmly announced that the right had 1,357 votes to the left's 1,149. The left challenged the count and demanded a roll-call vote. Mr. Gelo adjourned the meeting.

I hold no brief for the left wing. I believe that those of its members who are not Communists have been deluded by Communists. I realize if the left had controlled the meeting, the right would have received no better treatment than it dealt out. Still, the left wing was in the majority and should have won. The county leaders accepted the credentials of every delegate present and signified their willingness to decide the issue democratically. But they flouted democracy at every turn. Even if, by some miracle, it should be proved that the count of the hand vote was accurate, the county leaders would be suspect for (a) their refusal to turn the balloting over to the Honest Ballot Association or even to introduce printed ballots of their own, (b) their refusal to grant left-wing leaders their parliamentary rights, (c) their refusal to check the vote by roll call.

I propose to George S. Counts, chairman of the American Labor Party, and to Alex Rose, executive secretary, that they immediately appoint a committee to investigate the Kings County convention. Representatives of both sides and impartial outsiders should study the results and examine the conduct of John Gelo, Kings County chairman, and his subordinates. I realize that if the investigation shows what I and many others suspect it will, our side may well lose control of the state organization the party. That would be too bad. But would be no worse than having t party controlled by men who can't ke their prejudices and their arithme separated. RICHARD H. ROVERE

How About It?

Dear Sirs: In his very interesting artic England Teaches Its Soldiers, in T Nation for August 21, Reinhold Ni buhr says, "I have the uneasy feeli that the failure of American educato to interest themselves in the problem army education is responsible to a lar degree for the comparative educatio backwardness of the American army."

In the fall of 1941 I was receivi letters from former students of mi at the University of Chicago who we in various army camps. They said it w disturbing to realize how many of t soldiers had no idea what nazism w and thought this was just another w Having been granted leave of. absen by the University of Chicago to take the cudgels against isolationism, I wr to Secretary Stimson that I was goi to Washington and should like to s him. He replied that he would be New York when I was there but t Mr. John J. McCloy would see n When I called on this gentleman summoned Oveta Culp Hobby, at t time the morale builder of mothers American soldiers. They were not i pressed by extracts from the letters had received, or by my plea for t recognition of the psychological aspe of this war. Mr. McCloy finally end the interview with, "All soldiers ne to know is how to shoot."

In the fall of 1941 I offered services for nothing. I have raised price now! British army discussi groups are often led by women. have women over here, too, who ha taught young men and have had wealth of experience in leading disc sion groups. I am going over to Engla soon for a couple of months but I do some evening work when I get ba I have another job, but in war tim can take on a "victory shift" of ex work. How about it, Mr. McCloy? So Shallow wever, Mr. Humphries's generali- about the "shallow ponds of the ican provinces" does a serious dis- e to a number of literary magazines e United States which are pro- l in no sense except that of their of publication.

Sirs: The argument of Rolfe Hum- s's two-page review of the Moult logy in The Nation of August 21 e, I think, about which there can ttle disagreement. I said many of me things in a review of the pre- issue of Mr. Moult's perennial.

e magazine Fantasy (Pittsburgh), Mr. Humphries names among showing that the anthologist's erican impulses are much more ncial," has as much first-rate poetry e 152 pages of its current issue— ding work by Richard Eberhart, R. Hays, Clark Mills, Kenneth en, W. T. Scott, Byron Vazakas, Oscar Williams, etc., etc.—as there is in any American or British periodical which I have seen.

Some of the "shallow ponds of the American provinces" are fairly deep, and offer much of the best poetry which is being published today.

The Postal Case

Dear Sirs: Kelly Postal, secretary-treasurer of Minneapolis Teamsters Local 544—C. I. O., is now serving a five-year prison term solely because of his loyalty to the principles of trade-union democracy. He has been a worker and trade-union militant for thirty years; he is also a veteran of the First World War. The Kelly Postal case is as flimsy a frame-up as were the Tom Mooney and Sacco and Vanzetti cases.

In June, 1941, a long-standing conflict concerning the question of trade-union democracy between Local 544 and Daniel J. Tobin, president of the Teamsters International, A. F. of L., came to a head. Local 544 decided, by a virtually unanimous vote, to disaffiliate from the A. F. of L. and to join the C. I. O. Postal was one of the militant leaders in this struggle. Daniel J. Tobin made his first move personally against Postal, and also other leaders of Local 544, when he made an explicit appeal to President Roosevelt for help. Postal was one of those indicted in the Minneapolis labor case of 1941. He was cleared of all charges by the jury. But the campaign against him was continued. He was indicted by the Hennepin County attorney for embezzlement. He was not accused of having misused union funds personally. He was accused on this charge because, acting as treasurer of the local, he obeyed the democratic vote of the membership and transferred the union funds as he had been directed to. Judge Hall, sitting in the first trial, directed the jury to discharge Kelly Postal. He was re-indicted, and convicted on practically the same evidence and by the same witnesses as were introduced in his first trial. The Supreme Court of Minnesota sustained this convicton.

The Michigan C. I. O. has condemned the frame-up of Kelly Postal and urged its locals to give full moral and financial support to the Civil Rights Defense Committee, the authorized representative of his defense. In its resolution, the Michigan C. I. O. declared: "The conviction . . . violates and jeopardizes the democratic rights of trade-union members to decide for themselves the disposition of their funds, and endangers trade-union democracy fully as much as . . . the Smith-Connally Bill." A dangerous precedent has been established: a militant trade-unionist has been railroaded to jail. The Civil Rights Defense Committee is conducting a national campaign to free Kelly Postal. It asks all trade-unionists, all defenders of civil liberties to join in this effort. It asks that letters be sent to Governor Edward Thye, St. Paul, Minnesota, urging that he pardon Kelly Postal. The defense of Kelly Postal is the defense of trade-union democracy in this country; the freeing of Kelly Postal will be an important victory for trade-union democracy in the face of a wave of reaction which seeks to enchain labor by gag acts and other means.

Misplaced Credit

Dear Sirs: In your drama review in The Nation of August 28 an amazing error was made. Discussing the Negro as a basis for folk drama, your editor said: "In 'The Green Pastures' Marc Connelly created a charming extravaganza based on Marc Connelly's conception of the Negro's idea of Heaven."

I should like to point out that "The Green Pastures" is merely Marc Connelly's adaptation of Roark Bradford's concept of the Negro idea of Heaven. Too little credit has been given Mr. Bradford and his "Ol' Man Adam an' His Chillun" (published by Harper and Brothers in 1928), on which Marc Connelly's play was based. The book supplied a well-worked-out idea of charm and originality, which Mr. Connelly translated into the medium of the stage and movie. I realize the public cannot be blamed for not knowing this when little recognition and billing has been given Roark Bradford, but surely the literary editor of The Nation should be better informed. And for her information and delight, I recommend "Ol' Man Adam" to her.

[My abject apologies to Mr. Bradford for a quite inexcusable lapse of memory. I am doubly ashamed because I too am extremely annoyed when the credit for a good piece of work goes to the adapters and producers rather than the creator.—M. M.]

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 157 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 18, 1943 NUMBER 12

The Appeal to the Italian People

"THE hand that held the dagger has struck it into the back of its own people," President Roosevelt might well have said on that fateful summer day of 1940. For when Mussolini made of Italy a German stepping-stone to Africa he charted at least one invasion route for the United Nations. He thereby decreed that the Italian land should become a battleground for two mighty forces, the Wehrmacht and the Allied armies.

And still another consequence derived from the Duce's reckless crime. The Italian people, who had for long given proof that they did not wish to make war against us, have never had the chance of winning peace by surrender. Ever since the German failure to hold North Africa delivered Sicily into our hands, they have been confronted with the inescapable duty of joining us in the war against Hitler's Reich. And even though the terms of the armistice do not specifically demand that this warfare be continued after the completion of our occupation, that consequence is implied both by the text of Articles 2 and 9 and by the logic of the situation in which we and the Italians find ourselves. Italy cannot return to neutrality. That is the cardinal fact from which all thought about the future of the Mediterranean war front must proceed.

That the Italian population as a whole must, at least temporarily, take part in this revolutionary struggle was at last conceded by the President and Mr. Churchill in their joint appeal of September 10. That message signaled a fundamental and inescapable truth which will prove to be permanent. If we seize upon it, if we develop to their fullest the rich implications of the situation, the consequences which our impending military gains must necessarily have in the Balkans will be greatly multiplied. Never have we been given such an opportunity, and, to accept the logic of history gladly, never have we been given so clear a duty. The responsibilities which we were offered and which we shirked in the case of France are as nothing compared to those that challenge us in Italy.

There must be no pretense that our established foreign policy has played any part in bringing about the Italian surrender. Not the silent wizardry which certain conservative writers claim to be the special skill of our State Department but far more stringent arguments have overthrown Mussolini and humbled Badoglio. Three main causes stand up with Himalayan clarity above the confused geography of minor events. The causes of the Italian collapse were: first, the German military crisis, induced by the colossal failures on the Russian front; second, the progressive conversion of the Italian people's refusal to fight into a revolutionary will to be out of it; and third, the imminence of our invasion. No characteristic part of our foreign policy was even designed to effect the conjunction or intensify the action of these causes. Indeed, the State Department has consistently disclaimed having a hand in major developments of this war, preferring to assign responsibility to the military. Its present dependence on the will of the Italian people should suffice to establish the necessity of intelligent political warfare.

But it may not suffice. Our leaders may still fail to realize that the peoples of Europe can have no enthusiasm for a Metternichian peace and no profound loyalties to governments designed to be consonant with such a peace. The present regime, referred to as a government in the terms of the armistice, has already given proof that it cannot be regarded as a satisfactory leadership. It has vainly attempted to deny the unmistakable imperative of the Italian people's will. It has shown itself to be in every way as repressive in intention as the old Fascist regime. Its repression, indeed, was at first confessedly directed toward keeping Italy in the war on the Axis side.

We are making minimum charges that do not depend upon any theory concerning Badoglio's ultimate political motives but merely recite the salient facts. That he resisted the forces that are working in conjunction with our military effort should be sufficient. Nor should it incline us toward clement judgment that when he had already realized that our invasion and his collapse were inevitable, his dictatorship sought to maintain the old anti-democratic structure until the Germans should take over. That is to say, he did absolutely nothing to encourage the Italian people, whether in the army or out of it, to implement those terms of the armistice which call for military action. Only in Milan and other northern cities where the liberal movement has come to life was there serious resistance to the Germans. It is clear that Badoglio was, in reality, a nonentity having no force to oppose us and very little will to aid us.

But Badoglio did more than resist the popular imperative. Since Italian troops had demonstrated in Sicily that the palace revolution inspired them no more than naked fascism had done, Badoglio's bargaining power with us derived principally from the German army's presence. There is too much evidence that between July 25 and the second week in August, when the first peace overtures were made, he invited Hitler to send strong reinforcements to his aid. That part of Hitler's speech of September 10 which asserted the contrary referred to Badoglio's refusal to proceed with the inacceptably few divisions the Führer had originally agreed to dispatch. The essence of Badoglio's entreaty, according to a report that appears to have its source in the London Foreign Office, can be summed up in these words: "Either send at least 35 divisions, together with enough airplanes to defend all Italy, or permit me to bargain for neutrality." Whether or not at heart Badoglio would have preferred to remain loyal to the Axis, the fact is that his policy enabled Hitler to organize and strengthen his defenses. The price that must be paid in life and destruction will be far higher than the emerging democracy of Italy would have made it.

If Mussolini long ago charted the line of our military advance, the Italian people have surely indicated what political route we should follow. The London report already referred to states that the three powers concerned have made no binding contract to maintain Badoglio in power. It hints also that London is not unalterably opposed to acknowledging the existence of the opposition parties in Italy. It would have been better had the implied offer of partnership been made with the unmistakable timbre of a choir of orchestral brass. Italian democracy would have been far more encouraged had there been no vague suggestion that it was regretfully regarded as a last-minute alternative to military dictatorship.

It is still not too late to initiate a sound policy. One touch of living democracy is a powerful restorative that quickly banishes the effects of past sickness. Clause 10 of the armistice actually facilitates the restriction of purely military government by the Allies to regions judged by General Eisenhower to be of paramount operational importance. We shall not attempt to guess what this suggestive clause will be held to mean by our diplomats. Article 12 also states that other conditions of a political nature must eventually be accepted by the Italian government. We are thus at liberty to collaborate with a genuine Italian democracy or with those forces which will seek to recreate it. Will our fears and our past errors once again hold us back?

The Shape of Things

WHILE ASKING FOR A SECOND FRONT THAT would bring about the withdrawal of 60 German divisions from the eastern front, the Russians have been engaged in pushing westward the entire German army of some 200 divisions at about as rapid a rate as could possibly have been achieved by any Anglo-American action. Having completely smashed the German lines in the Donbas and in the sector halfway between Kursk and Kiev, the Red Army has moved forward with unprecedented speed. Advances as great as twenty miles in a single day have been reported. From an economic point of view the freeing of the Donets Basin with its rich coal deposits is far more significant than the more spectacular gains of last winter. Coal trains already are reported to be arriving in fuel-starved Moscow, thus making certain that that city will not have to pass another winter in cold and darkness. The only flaw in the prospect is the likelihood that the Soviet offensive may soon be stopped, not by the Nazis, but by the heavy autumn rains which are reported to have already begun in some sections of the Ukraine. This would, of course, give the Germans time to reform their lines and might hold off the recapture of Kiev and the Crimea until winter.

IN THEIR RELIEF OVER RUSSIA'S ROLE IN THE negotiating which preceded Italy's surrender, many Americans failed to note that France, the country most directly concerned in many of the arrangements, was ignored altogether. The French Committee of National Liberation has issued a strong statement pointing out that it had earlier informed the Allied governments of "terms which it regards as indispensable to safeguard the vital interests of . . . France," and that these conditions have been disregarded. This new snub to the National Liberation Committee appears to be a direct result of the equivocal recognition accorded it by the United States and Great Britain, under which it is not considered the government of France in the same sense, even, that the refugee governments are presumed to represent their countries. This policy is particularly difficult to justify in view of the progress made within the committee itself in the past fortnight in bringing it in line with patriotic French sentiment. François de Menthon, a leader of one of the largest of the French underground organizations, has been added to the committee and named to the key post of Commissioner for Justice. Moreover, the commission that is to supervise the purge of former Vichyites from the armed services includes three representatives of the underground among its five members. Plans have also been drawn up for a new consultative assembly to meet in Algiers on November 3. The various political parties are to be represented in the assembly in the same proportion as in the last Chamber of Deputies elected in France. Thus, while the American and British governments still treat the Committee of National Liberation as if it were a stepchild of the United Nations, the committee itself is rapidly taking on the stature of a real government.

A MOMENTOUS STEP WAS TAKEN BY THE Republican Party's Post-War Advisory Council at Mackinac Island last week, and we wish we knew what it was. It had to do with foreign policy, and we have the solemn editorial assurance of the most influential papers that it marked a turning-point in the history of the party, which with this remarkable achievement is said to have come of age, to have awakened to its national responsibility, and to have pointed the way to a bright future for all the world. After seven readings of the unanimously adopted report the only achievement we can detect is the council's astonishing success in equivocating at a moment when decisiveness at last seemed inescapable. The delegates voted for "responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations." But they hastily added that in the event of a conflict between national interests and international obligations, we must adhere to our own Declaration of Independence, Constitution, and Bill of Rights. Force in international affairs was condemned and a proposal made for the "attainment of a peace that will prevail by virtue of its inherent reciprocal interests and its spiritual foundation. . . ." But since no sacrifice of sovereignty was countenanced, we can't imagine what the council would use in place of collective force should some sovereign power fail to reciprocate sufficiently or relax in its appreciation of the spirit. Delegates of the most conflicting views came away from Mackinac rejoicing over the party's escape from a crippling internal row. " 'But what good came of it at last?' Quoth little Peterkin. 'Why that I cannot tell,' said he: 'But 'twas a famous victory.' "

BY CONTRAST WITH THE PERFORMANCE AT Mackinac, Secretary Hull's speech to the nation is bound to seem forthright. It does, in fact, clearly set the Administration's course in the direction of an international organization which will rely ultimately on the use of force to keep the peace. Mr. Hull's first major statement in more than a year of worldwide political turmoil is entitled to more study than we can give it at the moment of going to press, but beyond the pronouncement in favor of collective force, the address hardly leaves an initial impression of adequacy. In part it is a stale defense of past policies—Vichy, Franco Spain, Darlan—all of which are smugly credited with the military victories in the Mediterranean. We will have more to say about the Secretary's address in another issue. For the present we can at least record our pleasure over this tacit acknowledgment that the people are entitled to an accounting.

ON ANOTHER SCORE IT IS REFRESHING TO find ourselves saluting the Secretary of State for a job well done. His reply to Vice-Admiral Storni, Argentina's naive and now retired Foreign Minister, was a model of plain talk in a worthy cause. On behalf of the Ramirez government, which has been clapping anti-fascists in jail on the charge of communism at such a rate as to make Argentina a dream world for Martin Dies, Admiral Storni had the effrontery to ask the United States for lend-lease aid in the way of armaments and machinery. Far from pretending that the equipment would be used to carry out his country's unfulfilled pledge to aid in the defense of the hemisphere, Storni based his request on the desirability of restoring Argentina "to the position of equilibrium to which she is entitled with respect to other South American countries." As for Argentina's "prudent neutrality," Storni argued that it would not be "chivalrous" to break relations with the Axis now that it is doomed to defeat. To all of which Hull replied that, far from being benevolently neutral toward the United Nations, the Ramirez government, like its predecessor, has been fostering Axis agents and giving favorable prices on newsprint to Axis-subsidized papers. Lend-lease aid was refused with a bluntness that shook the pampas, and the Admiral was further left to infer that unless his country changes its tune it can hardly expect a seat at the table when the United Nations meet to discuss post-war plans. Having insulted the Nazis in the course of his gauche fling at diplomacy, the Admiral has jockeyed his country into what Buenos Aires wits describe as "true neutrality"—it is now on bad terms with everybody.

ALL CREDIT TO THE WAR DEPARTMENT AND Maurice Karker, chairman of its Price Adjustment Board, for their forthright attitude in attacking the big-business lobby now trying to stampede Congress into repealing or revising the contract renegotiation law. Karker, himself chairman of the Jewel Tea Company, no small concern, blamed the drive on a selfish minority, "the wilful 10 per cent whose excesses in the past have been responsible for the controls imposed on business." Karker declared that despite renegotiation 60 per cent of the companies whose contracts had been revised still averaged about 16 per cent in profits on their volume of sales. In Britain the profits of war contractors have been held to 7½ per cent on the capital used in their business. War profits here are enormous. Profits after taxes last year were greater than profits before taxes in 1929—$8,600,000,000 as against $8,400,000,000. The argument that renegotiation prevents the storing up of needed post-war reserves is utterly mendacious. Undistributed profits during the last four years total more than $16,000,000,000, and many firms already have plants on which all capital costs have been amortized out of war contracts.

C. B. BALDWIN, AFTER THREE YEARS AS Administrator of the Farm Security Administration, retires with honor to take a post in the State Department. The small farmer and the agricultural worker never had a better friend or a more courageous champion. Though the President accepted the resignation with words of praise for both Baldwin and the FSA, it is feared that Baldwin's going may be the end for Farm Security. Baldwin's new post, as Italian area director for the State Department, is one in which he will face much the same problems and obstacles he encountered in his former job. The protest made by James De Le Cron in resigning as chief of the Food Supply Division of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs indicates some of the difficulties Baldwin will face. Le Cron, long a close associate of Vice-President Wallace but himself a middle-of-the-roader, complains of "divided authority, lack of administrative organization, and want of directive policy in the State Department." Le Cron's letter of resignation details the annoying procrastination, petty interference, and sheer incompetence which so hamstrung his food-supply work in Latin America that he quit in disgust. We wonder how much Baldwin, for all his enthusiasm and ability, will be able to achieve in the bureaucratic morass of the State Department.

WE HAVE CONGRATULATED OURSELVES FROM time to time on the fact that violations of basic civil rights are fewer in this war than in World War I. That there is no ground for complacency, however, is shown by two recent events. In Oklahoma City three teachers were discharged because they objected to a clause in their contract barring them from membership in a labor union. One of the teachers blotted out the union clause before signing the contract and wrote in its place, "I am still a citizen of the United States." The others merely attached letters saying that they signed the contracts under duress and pointing out that the anti-union section was in conflict with their rights as citizens. In each case the discharged teachers merely stated a fact. Yellow-dog contracts of this type have been outlawed by federal law for many years, but unfortunately an appeal to the courts takes time and money. Equally serious in its implications is the court-martialing of Sergeant Alton Levy of the Lincoln, Nebraska, Air Base for expressing disapproval of the army's discriminatory treatment of Negro troops. Levy is reported to have warned against the danger of race conflict arising from such treatment, a warning that appears to have been justified, for later a riot broke out in his camp between Negroes and Americans of Mexican descent. It is gratifying to note that a group of distinguished citizens have appealed to Secretary Stimson and Judge Advocate General Cramer for a thorough review of the Levy case.

Congress Reconvenes

THE atmosphere of "getting on with the war" which has been evident in Washington for the past two months will be disturbed this week as Congress returns to its bitter partisan struggles. As was to be expected, none of the issues which rent Congress prior to adjournment has been solved by events during its recess. The chief responsibility before it remains, as was the case last January, the raising of sufficient taxes to head off inflation. It is expected that the House Ways and Means Committee will begin work on the tax bill no later than September 20. Although the President has asked for $16,000,000,000 as a minimum, a considerable amount of pressure may be needed to get even the $12,000,000,000 set as a goal by Secretary Morgenthau. Representative Carlson, sponsor of the Ruml skip-a-year tax bill, has already suggested that the surrender of Italy removes the necessity for higher taxes. Hope for a spendings tax which would tap the existing surplus of purchasing power and help curb unnecessary buying seems slight unless a considerable group of Congressmen have been sobered by their visit to their constituencies. Significantly enough, the Republican Mackinac resolution ignores taxation.

Even before the question of taxes comes up for consideration, a demand will be made for revising the Selective Service Act to prevent the drafting of pre-Pearl Harbor fathers. Most Washington observers agree that any bill carrying such a provision would be vetoed and could not be passed over the veto. Nevertheless, we must expect some such attempt to upset the Administration's man-power policies.

The capitulation of Italy should have the effect of building a fire under Congress on the vital questions of post-war policy, both international and domestic. The Fulbright resolution "favoring the creation of appropriate international machinery . . . to establish and maintain a just and lasting peace," having been passed by the House, goes to the Senate, where it should force a vote on the greatly superior Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution. In the domestic field action is urgently needed on plans for post-war employment along the lines of the proposals submitted six months ago by the National Resources Planning Board. Unless plans are drawn up this year and the necessary groundwork carefully laid, the country may find itself as unprepared for peace as it was in 1918. In this connection, immediate action is also called for on the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill for the revision of the Social Security Act. Under the law as it now stands demobilized service men have no social-security protection whatever. Congress has so far shown an extreme disinclination to grapple with post-war problems, but with the prospect, even though it be remote, that some of the service men may be demobilized before the next election, a change in attitude may be expected.

Our Good Luck

THE big question raised by General Marshall's biennial report as chief of staff is why so extraordinarily little war material was produced by American industry during the year and a half between the launching of the defense program in June, 1940, and the attack on Pearl Harbor. The report discloses a state of unpreparedness so bad as to make one wonder what would have happened if the Japanese had attempted to invade the West Coast and if the Nazis had decided to move west instead of east. "Immediately after Dunkirk in 1940," General Marshall says, "the British Isles were in effect defenseless so far as organized and equipped ground forces were concerned." A year later, in the summer of 1941, we seem to have been little better off. For when the Netherlands East Indies government begged for 25,000,000 rounds of a product as easily manufactured as small-arms ammunition, we had to "accept the hazard of reducing the ammunition reserve for the troops in movement to Iceland" in order to provide the Dutch with 7,000,000 rounds. How little this is may be seen from the fact that one plant due to get into production in October, 1941, was to turn out 7,000,000 rounds a day. "But that was to be too late," General Marshall says, "for the gathering storm in the Far East."

The gap between the scope of our military possibilities and the headlines on war production we were reading in the papers continued for months after Pearl Harbor. General Marshall tells how some six months after that Japanese attack we rushed "307 medium tanks and 90 self-propelled 105-mm. guns" to the Middle East from New York. This was at the time when the British were forced back to El Alamein and the Nazis had reached the Caucasus, and it looked as if the Near Eastern oil fields might be caught in a giant Nazi pincers movement. It would seem that production achievements were vastly exaggerated and that in the eighteen months before the war began business devoted most of its attention to civilian output, keeping armament to a leisurely sideline. This lackadaisical attitude, which permeated not merely business but the whole country, sets off in sharper relief the heroic story Marshall tells of the delaying action fought by our outnumbered and underequipped men in the Philippines. General Wainwright spoke for them when he said, just before Corregidor fell, "Although beaten we are still unashamed." The shame belongs to all but those few, foremost among them the President, who tried to speed military and naval preparations in the face of general complacency and inertia.

Anyone who reads the Marshall report will see how much we owe to British and Russian resistance. Had both or either crumpled, we should have faced a long and disastrous war on our own soil.

Washington Fog

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 10

THE news from New York is that the Sanitation Department had to sweep up twenty-two tons of confetti, ticker tape, and waste paper after the report of Italy's unconditional surrender. No such burden was imposed on the authorities here, where official celebration was restrained. At the State Department Wednesday noon the press room was jammed, and we all felt happy and excited over the news. A bet was made that such an occasion could not fail to get a rise even from Secretary Hull, but your correspondent, who was one of the optimists, must report that he lost the wager. When the Secretary was asked whether he cared to comment on the surrender (after receipt of the official announcement by General Eisenhower), he said—this is as nearly verbatim as the rules allow—that he had nothing to give us, that he had no comment to make, and that he had nothing to say at that time. It would have been nice if the Secretary had at least smiled and said something like, "I haven't any formal comment but you all know how I feel. It's swell." But I suppose I'm being utopian again.

At the White House the only word Steve Early had from the President was that this was Eisenhower's show.

Yesterday Hull was slightly more informative. He said he hoped to be able to comment more fully, more definitely, at a little later stage. This would seem to indicate that there might be something more in the wind, though it is unsafe to rely on deduction from the Secretary's nebulous phrases. On Wednesday, for example, he was asked whether the Anglo-American-Soviet Mediterranean Commission would deal primarily with military matters. Hull's somewhat perplexing answer was that this was why he was not in a position to give out any information. That sounded as though the commission would be largely military and as though news of it would therefore have to be obtained from the War Department. But this morning Harold Callender, who has an inside track at the department, reported in the New York Times that through its representation on the commission the Soviet Union "will participate in economic and political decisions touching Italy and the entire Mediterranean basin."

The whole question of the Mediterranean Commission is mystifying. On Saturday, September 4, Churchill made a long "off the record" talk at a National Press Club luncheon. "Authoritative-source" stories followed in the next day's papers. The best of these was the four-column story by Paul W. Ward in the Baltimore Sun, and I recommend a careful reading of it to all who are interested in obtaining a clear view of British foreign policy at this time. Churchill is still the 1890 imperialist. At the luncheon it was revealed that there were under consideration plans, as yet tentative, for the creation of a Mediterranean Commission on which presumably Russia would have equal representation with Britain and the United States. Several days later this elicited some surprise "in the highest quarters" here. (I'm sorry to have to write this way but there are rules, and this will at least give the reader an idea of the fog in which reporters who cover foreign policy have to wander.) At the State Department Hull's first reaction seemed to be one of ignorance. It may be that the commission is a British idea and that the White House, with its close ties to the Vatican, is embarrassed at the prospect of Soviet participation in political decisions on Italy, even if Stalin is permitting the Russian Orthodox church to convoke a synod.

This talk of a three-power commission and General Eisenhower's announcement that the surrender terms had been approved by the Soviet as well as the American and British governments would seem to constitute the best news in some time on the diplomatic front. On what our government is planning for Italy's future I have, frankly, no real news. Neither has anyone else. I note that Salvemini and La Piana's excellent and indispensable new book, "What to Do with Italy," agrees generally with the Kingsbury Smith crypto-official article, Our Government's Plan for a Defeated Italy, in the August issue of the American Mercury, though the former is written from the anti-clerical left, the latter from the piously pro-State Department right. Salvemini and La Piana say we are in Italy to prevent a republican social revolution; Kingsbury Smith, to prevent anarchy. It seems fairly clear that we do not intend to force democracy on the Italian people. With one exception, official pronouncements here and abroad to the Italian people are uniformly lacking in any appeal that might be construed as an invitation to establish free government. The one exception was Secretary of War Stimson's reference yesterday to the Risorgimento as "a glorious chapter in the history of human freedom." The Secretary said it was our purpose to recreate this freedom. But, then, Stimson is unregenerate in his democratic beliefs, as demonstrated once before by his public appeal for the lifting of the embargo against the Spanish Republic.

Whatever our plans for Italy, an attempt will be made to use Eisenhower's victory to consolidate Hull's position. Arthur Krock has already discovered that the unconditional surrender was a triumph of State Department policies, though aided of course by "General Eisenhower's military expedients, which logically progressed from them." This is certainly putting a wee little cart before a very big horse. A Krock scoop is the discovery that by refusing to grant full recognition to De Gaulle we "encouraged hope in Axis-subjugated nations that they will be left free to select their own civil governments." What he really means is that by our attitude toward De Gaulle we encouraged trimmers like Victor Emmanuel and Badoglio to believe that no attachment of ours to democratic and popular forces would stand in the way whenever they decided that it had become profitable to shift sides. Another reflection of this is the anxiety of the Hungarian, Rumanian, and Bulgarian ruling classes to jump our bandwagon and get the protection of our troops against popular uprisings. This may hasten a Balkan invasion.

I never dreamed that Hull would some day force us to make a hero of Sumner Welles. An even stranger episode may be in the making. The indications are that Robert Murphy, now on his way home, will not return to North Africa. Department gossip suspects that Murphy has fallen out of favor with both Hull and Roosevelt because he was won over to full recognition of the French National Committee. Murphy seems to be regarded now as too favorable to the Gaullists. The President, it would seem, has never been closer in outlook to his Secretary of State. A new executive order is said to be in preparation which will greatly increase Hull's authority over Lend-Lease, Relief and Rehabilitation, the OEW, and other agencies operating abroad. One proposal is to make Stettinius and Lehman Assistant Secretaries of State. Silence, meanwhile, continues to reign over the unmarked political grave of Sumner Welles. I am told that the Secretary will wait until Congress convenes before announcing the Welles resignation and the name of his successor. It seems to be feared that an earlier announcement would give public opinion time to work up enough protest to make it difficult to obtain Senate confirmation of the new candidate for Under Secretary. If this is true, one would tend to conclude that Hull's choice is still someone of the type of Breckinridge Long or James Clement Dunn or Norman H. Davis.

Let's Look at Labor

VIII. RUSSIA AND LABOR UNITY

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, August 15

IT IS elementary to any rational thinking about the post-war world that there can be no secure peace either in Europe or the Far East save as a full understanding is reached between the United States, the Soviet Union, and ourselves. That need arises, in part, as a necessary recognition of Soviet power; and perhaps the exponents of Realpolitik, both here and in the United States, will regard this as the strongest argument in the case. But it arises, also, out of two other reasons, neither of which it seems to me can be legitimately overlooked or underestimated.

The heroic part played by the Soviet Union against Hitlerism has done more than twenty-five years of Communist propaganda to domesticate the idea of the Russian Revolution in the mind of the common peoples of Europe and Asia; we shall neglect, at our peril, the importance of finding terms of common friendship with that idea. And the development of the economic organization exacted by totalitarian war has made the danger of monopoly capitalism to the freedom of the workers greater, and not less, than it was in 1939. If that freedom is to be sure of protection and of growth in the post-war period, it is, in my own judgment, essential that the working classes of the three countries shall have reached a working arrangement before the war ends. Without it, there is the gravest danger that internal differences in each country will be used, as in Germany, Italy, and France, as the basis upon which the counter-revolution, of which Hitlerism is merely one expression, sweeps to power. It has therefore become imperative to find terms of mutual accommodation between the Soviet Union and the working classes of Britain and America as a safeguard against the danger that, even after the defeat of the Axis powers, the impersonal forces of our civilization may drag us, a third time, to a battle for the supremacy of the world.

It is well known that Britain and the Soviet Union are, so far as the labor movement is concerned, engaged in at least a preliminary effort to find these common terms. I do not exaggerate the importance of the Anglo-Soviet Trade Union Committee. I recognize that, so far, its significance has been rather in the realm of propaganda than of policy. I agree that it has not even sought to grapple with the delicate and difficult problems which arise out of the different status and purpose of the trade unions in Britain and in the Soviet Union. I do not deny that it seems to serve rather as a gesture of good-will than as an institution which seeks to shape events. But it is important that the committee is there. The very fact that it exists provides a basis upon which, at a later stage, a more adequate superstructure can be built.

In the 1943 conference of the British Labor Party I was authorized by its National Executive to give a pledge that, if the Soviet Union agreed, a delegation would proceed to Moscow at the earliest possible moment to discuss all outstanding differences between our two countries, and to find, if possible, a basis of lasting friendship between them. That pledge, I add, had the approval of the three ex-chairmen of the Second International—the eminent Belgian statesmen MM. de Brouckère and Camille Huysmans, and the Dutch Minister M. Albarda. They agreed with us that it would be the height of folly to maintain in the generation after the war the divisions within the working-class movement which, in the inter-war years, did so much to weaken its strength and frustrate its purposes.

The delegation has not yet gone because we are not of the opinion that the favorable moment has come.* But I reveal no secret when I say that we have reason to know that it will be welcome in Moscow, and that it is likely that it will proceed there within this next year to attempt to heal the divisions which have done so much harm. I do not know, of course, whether it will succeed. Its task, on any showing, will be both arduous and delicate; and it is obvious that, fairly early in its negotiations, it will become necessary to relate its discussions to the tasks of the working-class parties in Europe, if its agreements are to prove effective. The point I am concerned to make at this stage is the simple one of a growing recognition, both in London and in Moscow, that, in Benjamin Franklin's admirable phrase, the working classes in all countries must hang together in peace as well as in war or else they will hang separately.

II

The American trade-union movement has refused, so far as the A. F. of L. is concerned, to be a party to the Anglo-Soviet Trade Union Committee; and I gather that historical reasons prevented Sir Walter Citrine from making an approach to the C. I. O. On the political side, I have no knowledge of the attitude of the various divisions of the American Socialist movement in regard to the attempt to rediscover the terms on which the international working class might find unity. What, at this distance, alone seems clear is the fact that the generation of internecine conflict, both in the industrial and in the political field, between the American Communists on the one hand and on the other the American Socialists and trade unionists who are unable to accept the Communist Party creed, has dug an abyss which, so far, not even the partnership of war has been able to bridge. Though Hitlerism, whether in its European or in its Asiatic form, is not less the enemy of the American worker than of the Russian, it does not appear that the common danger has made the leaders of American labor or American socialism recognize that there are common interests which require an appropriate organization for their protection.

And those common interests will not end with the achievement of military victory. All of us in the working-class movement who are willing to face the future realistically must recognize how grave is the danger that though the United Nations win the war they may lose the peace. More, they must grasp the fact that losing the peace means, in essence, the emergence of circumstances in which there is a relentless drift to a third world war; and the main price, of both that drift and that war, would be paid, as the price of this war is being paid, by the working class. A third world war, if it were to come, would come because we failed to establish, after victory, those relations of production which, by making possible an economy of expansion, would enable us to establish conditions in which the Four Freedoms would be more than rhetorical phrases. Without an economy of expansion there can be no international security from aggression; without it all social policy is bound to be subordinated to strategic considerations. The alternative to an economy of expansion is a new industrial feudalism. And if that develops, I must be permitted to remark that the American workers will face a prospect not less bleak than that by which the workers of Europe and Asia will be confronted. I submit, with great respect, that the leaders of American labor, whether on its industrial or on its political side, ought every so often to reread the report of such a body as the La Follette Committee on Civil Liberties, and ask themselves what would happen to their gains of the last ten years if there were once again in the White House a President who assumed an identity between democracy and laissez faire.

I assume, in short, that any intelligent citizen now realizes that nations, however powerful, are interdependent; that modern technology and above all modern means of communication have made a policy of isolation as obviously impossible as it is unwise. And I infer from this the need to find ways and means of protecting the common interests of the workers in a unified world, just as business men find ways and means of protecting their special common interests. The clear implication of this, in my submission, is the folly of refusing to consider how the interests of American workers can be integrated with those of Britain and the U. S. S. R. The fact that our political systems are different is not, in my judgment, the decisive obstacle that the American Federation of Labor assumes it to be. I am willing to admit that the U. S. S. R. has made mistakes, committed blunders, been guilty, as the execution of Ehrlich and Alter testifies, of crimes. It is still the fact that whatever weakens the U. S. S. R. weakens the working class all over the world, that the transition to an effective democratic government in the U. S. S. R. is a function of its security from aggression after the war, and that its security from aggression depends, in its turn, upon our ability to organize an economics of expansion with the coming of peace.

Quite frankly, it seems to me unpardonable for the leaders of American labor, industrial or political, to assume that they can secure an economics of expansion merely by exercising pressure upon their own government. For, first of all, the history of the Roosevelt regime shows that, acting alone, they are not strong enough to do so; otherwise, the New Deal would not, in the period of peace, have been so constant a struggle between recovery and reform; nor would it, since Pearl Harbor, have been driven by big business to retreat into winter quarters. And, secondly, by refraining from helping to shape a common policy for the workers among the United Nations, they gravely detract from the influence these are in a position to exert in Europe and Asia. It is, indeed, not untrue to say that most of the dangers we shall face when the peace comes, many indeed of the dangers which are emerging as we move slowly to victory, come from the fact that the leaders of American labor cease to think once their vision reaches the frontiers of the United States, and that they have little more than spasmodic emotions about those international problems in which their people, not less than ours, are now inextricably involved. Until they come to understand that the thing we call Hitlerism, whether in its German or Italian or Japanese form, is a world phenomenon which summarizes vital and dangerous tendencies in the United States and Britain as well as among the Axis powers, they will be quite unable to formulate a policy proportionate to the dangers they confront. Until they understand that there is only a temporary truce in the battle they have been waging with counter-revolution in their own country and that, with the armistice, their historical enemy will begin again to deploy his forces against them, they will wholly fail to grasp the nature of the problem they face. And the sooner they recognize that, to solve their problem, they need all the power and influence the workers of Britain and the U. S. S. R. can bring to their support, the sooner they will set their problem in the framework which gives them the hope of success.

III

I infer from this analysis that it is as wise as it is obligatory for American labor to play its full part with British labor in arriving at an understanding with the U. S. S. R. No one who looks carefully at the nature of the regimes which may develop among the United Nations when Hitlerism is defeated, who measures the significance of the social and economic forces implied in the candidatures for power which seek, and may well obtain, the patronage of the American State Department and the British Foreign Office, can avoid the conclusion that the Soviet Union is the central support upon which the future of working-class interests depends. In the degree that it is strong, they will be strong; in the degree that it is weak, they will be weak too. To arrive at a modus vivendi with its leaders is essential for two things. It is the one sure way to prevent the working-class divisions of the inter-war years from being perpetuated; if these divisions continue, monopoly capitalism will have little difficulty in establishing an authoritarian empire. It is, in the second place, the one sure way to safeguard the democratic element in the difficult and delicate relationship of capitalist democracy. For the stronger the U. S. S. R. is, the more able it will be to fulfil the potentialities of planned production for community consumption; and the greater the degree of that fulfilment, the more necessary will it be for Britain and the United States to embark upon that economics of expansion in the absence of which democratic government has no great prospects in the post-war years.

I do not argue for one moment that the modus vivendi will be easy to achieve. Twenty-five years of the cordon sanitaire have made the leaders of the U. S. S. R. nationalist, suspicious, secretive; and the immense burdens their people have borne since Hitler's attack have made them consciously virtuous in a degree that is irritating to the point of resentment. Moreover, as the midwives of the Socialist revolution, they tend to assume an attitude of effortless superiority which makes the particular of their special experiences seem to them, as it were, a universal image before which all other nations must bow.

Self-righteousness of this kind is an inevitable phase in any people which has wrung victory from disaster. Our business is to be patient with its gestures, to penetrate beyond them to the foundations they never wholly conceal. The Russian Revolution is a stage in the completion of that process of human emancipation in which the English civil wars, 1776, and 1789 were vital epochs. The present conflict, seen in its proper perspective, is essentially an attempt to arrest that process in the interests of privilege. It will be a tragedy indeed if the leaders of American labor fail to recognize the opportunity that is theirs.

[This is the last of a series of eight articles on the problems confronting American labor.]

This contrasts with a domestic rate of $4.57 in adjacent Knoxville and $4.50 in New York. . . . The New York Times editorially views the new program at Muscle Shoals as a means "to beat into submission an industry which seems to have been singled out as an exception to the current theories of fair competition." To chide the Administration for ignoring the principles of fair competition in dealing with an industry which has never suffered competition of any kind, and has reciprocated for this privilege with unconscionable profiteering, impresses us as highly amusing.—September 27, 1933.

Pushing the Japanese Back

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

CONCENTRATION on Japanese problems at the Quebec conference was an indication that the tide of war is running in our favor in the Pacific as well as in the Atlantic. In fact, in every sector of the Pacific the enemy is now on the defensive.

Japan's present difficulty is the direct result of its earlier method of conquest. Instead of concentrating on one objective at a time, it struck in all directions at once. Owing partly to the mistakes of the Allies but mainly to their weakness, its arms were everywhere successful, and it soon acquired an enormous empire. Its conquests, however, could be held only loosely by the limited forces at its command, and their defense presented severe logistic problems because of their distance from the centers of power. With any increase of enemy force on the periphery of its holdings, it would naturally be obliged to contract them and either abandon outposts as it has done at Kiska or risk large losses as in the Solomons.

American strength in areas adjoining the Japanese conquests has in fact grown enormously. Official figures are of course unobtainable, but for more than a year our air power has outmatched the Japanese in quality and now is doubtless superior in quantity as well. After Pearl Harbor the navy, fortunately about equal to the Japanese in carrier strength, had just three sound battleships in the Pacific to the enemy's twelve or fourteen. Today the Pacific fleet, reinforced by the three battleships of the Idaho class from the Atlantic, the six new "North Carolinas," three of the Pearl Harbor casualties, and perhaps two new 45,000-ton "Iowas," has sixteen to eighteen battlewagons. Also at least ten regular carriers, some of them of the 10,000-ton converted-cruiser class, have been or are very close to being commissioned. The rate of reinforcement of the Pacific fleet, now one vessel a day, will increase still further in the future. It is hardly likely that the Japanese dockyards have been idle, but they are of materially smaller capacity than ours and have been encumbered with the repair of damaged vessels. The naval loss ratio, even counting Pearl Harbor, has been heavily in our favor.

It is these facts which explain the Japanese decision to abandon the fruitless foothold at Kiska rather than risk disproportionate losses by trying to maintain it. Bulldog tenacity, having failed to pay dividends, is apparently no longer being practiced. However, the strategic sense the Japanese have gained from experience should make them more rather than less dangerous in the days ahead.

In the southwestern Pacific as at Kiska the enemy was wise in not choosing to squander large forces in a probably losing fight along a line of outposts of no great strategic value. The fact that no attempt was made to hold them is an excellent sign, however, that the initiative is slowly but very definitely passing into American hands; of course, our gains in all zones have been as yet little more than pin pricks to the Japanese, and pricks far indeed from that nation's heart.

In view of the encouraging setup, what moves can reasonably be expected in the near future? Are we now ready for the decisive offensive?

In order to arrive at an answer we must consider certain fundamental facts about the Japanese war. It is, in the first place, a conflict carried on over areas so great as to dwarf those of any previous struggle. The logistics problems of both sides, but especially of the United States, are tremendous. Since the effectiveness of any force diminishes in direct ratio to its distance from its base of supply, an offensive deep into enemy waters requires much more than a margin of superiority; it requires, rather, overwhelming superiority.

In the second place, the offensive against Japan must not be allowed to interfere with prosecution of the war against Hitler. Sufficient force for a vigorous holding campaign is essential, but beyond this the effort must be made with that strength, mainly naval, which is not urgently needed in the European conflict.

With these limitations in mind, it is fairly clear that a major offensive in the Pacific must await developments elsewhere. The Japanese abandonment of Kiska is of only negative value. Planes now in production will enable us to bomb the northern Japanese islands, but until such aerial softening up can be provided, amphibious moves against the Kuriles are hardly likely. Action to test the obstacles on the southern route to Tokyo are sure to be continued. Hit-and-run raids by cruiser-carrier task forces, much like the recent expedition against Marcus Island, will form part of this pattern. Large numbers of the "stationary airplane carriers" north of the equator can be attacked with damaging results.

The success of this program, a necessary preliminary to a major campaign against Japan in the Pacific, is more threatened at the moment by the renewed drive for a separate air force than by the resistance of the enemy. An absolute essential to a successful campaign by the navy is the control and centralized direction of its own aviation. The divorce of air power from sea power, already proposed in Congress, would repeat an experiment which, when tried in the British navy, proved disastrous. The navy and its air corps are at present moving efficiently and smoothly together toward a victory that is in sight. If at such a point we abandon a type of warfare which is bringing results in favor of untried military "get-rich-quick" schemes, we deserve a very rude awakening. In the present war close coordination of all weapons and groups has been the key to victory.

As it happens, the Pacific is not, at the moment, the most likely arena for the next big battle against Japan. The most logical major move is unquestionably an invasion of Burma. Stakes here are so large as to justify considerable expenditure. The reopening of land communications with China and the resultant implementing of that nation's war effort would alone make such a move worth while. The reconquest of important oil reserves, the redemption of Anglo-American prestige, and the acquisition of bases for even more direct land and ultimately for air offensives are other advantages which would follow victory on this battlefield.

The only doubtful factor in a thrust here is sea power. The nearby Indian army is fifteen times as large as the estimated force of 100,000 Japanese in Burma. Superiority in air power is ours. It is to be presumed that the recent shifts in command made by the British have been partly for the purpose of organizing a more energetic back-of-the-lines system of supply—a fatal weakness of last year's invasion attempt. And even in shipping and naval power the United Nations are far better off than they were last year. The surrender of Italy, the multiplication of Allied air bases in the Mediterranean, and the output of British shipyards have produced so overwhelming a naval preponderance that diversions can now safely be made to the Bay of Bengal. It may be necessary to afford the protection of carriers to important troop convoys, and it is of course highly desirable to coordinate a land invasion of Burma with naval moves designed to keep the Japanese fleet in the Pacific.

Burma is not, however, an ultimate Allied objective any more than the Kuriles or Wake or New Guinea. Its conquest is an important preliminary step in driving land wedges through Japanese-held territory to the China Sea. If we can take this step and at the same time push our bases west and north in the South Pacific, we shall have an excellent chance of narrowing and finally severing the Japanese line of communications with the Indies. These possessions, cut off from Japanese support, could then be reduced at moderate cost. Then Japan would be near defeat.

These plans cannot be carried out in the immediate future, for we are not yet ready to concentrate all our efforts against our enemy in the Pacific. But our strength is steadily growing, and it is likely that the coming months will see the preliminary moves.

Those Post-War Miracles

BY FRANCIS WESTBROOK, JR.

THE fantasies of advertising and publicity are arousing in the American public, suffering from a war-time shortage of consumer goods, the expectancy that when the day of peace comes they will be able to cash in their war bonds and buy industrial miracles. The single curb on promises has been the limit of imagination. Automobiles, selling at temptingly low prices, will be made of strange new materials and assume shapes ranging from fried eggs to tanks. Business men will commute a hundred or more miles in helicopters, landing on the roofs of office buildings and in the back yards of their "suburban" homes. People will live in "dream" houses—will pass the day watching the events of the world on television screens while all kinds of electrical devices run these houses far more skilfully than could any human hand. The new vacuum cleaners, radios, refrigerators, and washing machines will make the pre-war models as obsolete as a Model T Ford.

To say that all of these dreams are impossible would be foolhardy, but it is misleading the public to give the impression that they will materialize right after the peace. The truth is that the first post-war models of most durable consumer goods, of automobiles and refrigerators, for example, will closely resemble those turned out in 1942. The radical changes, of which there will certainly be many, will not appear for at least a year—in some cases much longer. This time lag can have serious consequences, affecting the entire conversion of industry from war to peace-time production.

Stated in its simplest terms, the problem is this: the necessity of converting industry as fast as possible and of keeping employment at a maximum through the demobilization period indicates a return to models that can be placed in production at the earliest moment, but the consuming public, misled by "juicy" advertising, is expecting revolutionary products. A definite sales resistance is therefore bound to develop when the old models appear. People will ask themselves whether they cannot make the best of what they have until the improved goods come on the market. Even when the changes do begin to appear, they will be gradual. Meanwhile a monkey wrench will have been thrown into the conversion process. The more thoughtful industrialists are worried.

The problem is most clearly illustrated by the prospects in the automobile industry, which in 1941 was little short of a four-billion-dollar business and is generally considered a keystone of the American economy. Though the entire capacity of almost every automobile factory today is engaged in war production, much of the machinery for producing peace-time cars in the 1941 volume is available in storage, only waiting to be moved back into place to turn out the latest pre-war models. It has been estimated that this can be accomplished in three or four months, while to retool and prepare designs for models incorporating many of the proposed changes would require a year at least. It will be remembered that when Ford changed from the Model T to the Model A some years ago, all production was stopped for about this length of time.

The manufacturer will be influenced by three legitimate considerations: the desire to place a salable car on the market as soon as possible; the obligation to maintain the greatest possible employment during conversion—a complete retooling for radically new models would mean a year or more of idleness for a great number of workers; and the possible necessity of meeting a transportation crisis caused by a shortage of usable cars at the end of the war. It has been estimated that automobiles are wearing out at the rate of two and one-half million a year. If the war should be long, the situation could become serious.

The consumer, in deciding whether or not to buy a new car, will be influenced first by how badly he needs one and secondly by how important he thinks the eventual improvements will be. These have been pictured in glowing terms with very little reference to how long it will take to make them realities. The consumer will need some clear information about what is coming and how soon.

The most important advances are likely to be in the use of new materials, such as plastics, the light metals now widely used in aircraft, and new tough alloys. These alloys, because of their strength and heat resistance, will make possible far lighter engines. It has been predicted that use of these materials may bring the weight of some models down to 1,000 pounds. Lightness, coupled with the use of 100-octane gasoline such as is now produced in great quantity for war planes, should increase mileage and reduce running costs. Innumerable other developments have been promised, including tops of the transparent plastic now used in the gun turrets of bombers, air-conditioned interiors, motors at the rear instead of in front, and automobiles that will fly.

Coming down to probabilities, it seems likely that a few years after the war the consumer will be able to buy a light-weight, low-gas-consuming car for around $400. But he will not get it immediately, and he may never see the more fantastic promises realized. A recent statement by George Romney, managing director of the National Industrial Conference Board, throws some light on the possible length of the consumers' wait. Romney said that he did not know of a single firm doing experimental work on post-war cars. All are too busy with war production.

The picture for the whole range of durable consumer goods presents the same pattern. The impression has been created, for example, that television will be universally available after the peace; yet television's greatest handicap, its inability to carry beyond the horizon, has not been satisfactorily overcome. Until some economical system of relays has been devised, television probably will be confined to congested population areas. Its maximum effective range at present is about seventy miles.

FM—frequency modulation—radio seems to hold greater promise for the immediate post-war period. It was well on its way before Pearl Harbor, and it is reasonable to expect that it will be generally available far sooner than some other products that have not progressed beyond the "promise" stage. While conventional radio is limited to 5,000 vibrations or cycles per second, FM is capable of the entire range of the human ear—from 16 to 16,000 cycles per second—thus giving full value to music and speech.

Developments are to be expected in the electrical appliance field. Refrigerators have been promised which will not only be made of "exciting" new materials (largely plastic), but will also be capable of greater temperature control and of meeting the requirements of the expanding frozen-food industry. Electric stoves will have new temperature controls and automatic devices. Work is said to be under way on a washing machine that will wash, rinse, and dry, all for the turning of a switch. An improved steam iron is on the way. Something may also be expected from the vacuum-cleaner industry. But in the great majority of cases the first post-war models will be to all intents and purposes the same as the old; only as experimentation and retooling are completed, will new designs be offered.

There will be exceptions of course. Some manufacturers had important new products "all ready to go" when war was declared. These will be available immediately. Aviation, concerning which some of the wildest predictions have been made, may almost bear them out, especially in the commercial-transport branch. While production of the aviation industry totaled only $280,000,000 in 1938, it is expected this year to exceed the astronomical figure of $20,000,000,000, and possibly to double that in 1944. Its unprecedented facilities can be converted with relative ease to the production of civilian planes. The production of transport planes already is enormous, and some of these might be put directly into commercial use.

Commercial transportation both of freight and passengers is expected to progress faster than private operation. The National Resources Planning Board has estimated that "within the next decade or two air travel in the United States will assume approximately 70 per cent of present-day Pullman rail travel, or about six billion passenger-miles"; according to the OWI this would mean the transportation of about twenty million people a year. The Civil Aeronautics Board more optimistically predicts that this volume will be reached in 1946.

Ownership of private planes will come more slowly, partly because operators will need a great deal of training and partly because the war-plane factories are not building models that would be suitable for private use. Development and conversion must come first. The helicopter may help solve a number of problems, especially the remoteness of landing fields, but here again considerable development work will be required.

Much of the "dream" advertising, it may be noted, has been by companies that hope to crash new markets. Established manufacturers of automobiles, electrical appliances, and so on have been in general more conservative, and are now genuinely worried. The most fantastic promises have been made by manufacturers of war materials who know that they will have to turn to civilian lines to keep their vastly expanded facilities in operation. For example, plastics companies are looking for new outlets in automobiles, refrigerators, and the building trades. And it has been intimated that the aviation industry will turn excess capacity to the production of automobiles. Such concerns can best buck the established competition by coming out with radically new products—by making a direct assault on the consumer's imaginaiton. Companies of various kinds are thinking along these lines, and their publicity has been abetted by the fertile imagination of advertising men, by war profits, and by a Treasury policy of making money spent for advertising deductible from income tax under certain circumstances.

Although the necessities of conversion seem to dictate a return to the models that can be most quickly brought out, the manufacturer has a responsibility to the public to turn out the best article he can—one incorporating a maximum of worth-while developments—as soon as is economically feasible. The unscrupulous will feel tempted to sell up a hungry market on the old product and save the new stuff as bait for a time when the going is harder. A progressive change in style and models has long been used as a device to put off the consumers' saturation point. New developments have been deliberately held up or parceled out bit by bit. It would be a great scandal if the hard-won technical advances of the war period, many of them developed with government money, were exploited in this manner. A healthy deterrent may be provided by the competition of war industries, which will certainly try to break into civilian markets with every conceivable type of product. The trouble is that they, too, will require time for experimentation and conversion.

A BOOKLET "intended to help defeat the New Deal in the coming national election" is sponsored by Senator E. H. Moore of Oklahoma. It is entitled "The Other Freedom—Freedom of Opportunity," and here are two samples of its wares: "If we are to have freedom of opportunity we must keep open to our youth progress through inequality." . . . "It was a small group meeting in a beer parlor in Bergtesbaden [sic] that began the movement that set the world on fire by this war. It can be a small group meeting in some quiet place that will offer the plan of peace that will end the conflict and usher in a period of peace."

REPRESENTATIVE LEROY JOHNSON of California recently told the Sacramento Masons that "the white man deserves his place in the world," that "ignorant, prejudiced, biased human beings in other parts of the world" should be taught "intelligence, self-denial, and self-control," and that the need of the hour was "world stabilization where wars would cease and the white man would not be depleted."

CLUBS AND DISCUSSION GROUPS throughout the country will soon be granted the privilege of seeing a film prepared by the Association of National Advertisers, "The Fifth Freedom." Editor and Publisher describes it as an attack on grade labeling. "In a dramatization, exaggerated for effect, it presents the ultimate in what might happen should regimentation of merchandise become universal."

A LETTER to the editor of the New York Daily News offers the following information about brain food: "The strongest argument I know of against vegetarianism is the British people, who have been known for centuries as beef eaters. I don't know whether beef is a brain food, or what; but anyway, we fought for freedom from the British in 1776, and they got us back in 1942 without firing a shot."

PARACHUTE SILK rejected by the armed forces will henceforth be available without restriction, the WPB announces, for the manufacture of baby pants and women's underwear.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Vichy government is mobilizing cripples for light work—in Germany. . . . Eight hundred miles of railroad track have been removed from Belgium to help meet the shortage in Germany. . . . Dutch Nazis who have been sending their children to special Nazi schools will now have to return them to the regular Dutch schools; the children will have to put up with the silence and contempt of their schoolmates in an effort to win converts.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Japan's Choice for India

BY JOHN W. GERBER

LITTLE news has come out of India during the past two months. Nehru is silent behind prison walls, and if the people continue to demonstrate on the reets, our papers have not reported it. But silence does ot necessarily imply submission. India still boils with ustration and unrest. It is the scene of one of the most ismal political failures of the United Nations, and Japaese machinations are working to turn that failure into ctory for the "Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere."

The central figure in the Japanese campaign is Subhas handra Bose, beloved by millions of Indians who reember him as a fiery patriot and leftist leader. In the rly 1920's Bose became associated with Gandhi's Nonooperation League. He speedily rose to prominence as e right-hand man of C. R. Das, the renowned Bengal ader. In 1928 he joined Nehru in forming the Indian ndependence League, which once and for all rejected andhi's advocacy of dominion status. Nehru described ose time and time again as "a dear and valued comde." In 1930, while he was in jail, Bose was elected ayor of Calcutta, and later, in 1938 and 1939, presient of the Congress Party.

But the party's policy of non-violence finally irritated ose beyond endurance. His nationalist activity had been ewarded by more than a dozen jail sentences, by serious npairment of his health, and by what he considered the isloyalty of his associates to his person. It has also been id that he was jealous of Nehru, whose influence alone rpassed his.

In 1939 Bose resigned from the presidency of the ongress Party to organize the Forward Bloc, in which any Indians saw the hope of a real revolutionary moveent. Nehru knew better. He described it as a "rival rganization" to the Congress. "Under cover of fine hrases," he said, "adventurist and opportunist elements ound platforms. I could not help but think of the rise f the Nazi Party in Germany, whose way had been to obilize mass support for one program only to utilize for an entirely different purpose."

And indeed Nehru's words proved prophetic. When ose finished a jail term in 1941, he made his way to erlin, where he was apparently taken into the councils f the mighty. He had discarded the priniciple of noniolence forever.

In June of this year he moved to Tokyo. His arrival as timed to coincide with Japan's big political offenve: the promise of "independence" for Burma and preparations for independence in the Philippines; the award of four Shan states to Thailand; the attempt to "appease" the Chungking government. In a speech broadcast to India from transmitters in Tokyo, Rangoon, Bangkok, and Singapore, Subhas Chandra Bose set the keynote for his campaign. "The moment has arrived for all Indians who love liberty to act," he said. "Whatever action is taken in war time requires military discipline and complete loyalty to the cause. It is for this reason that I appeal to all Indians in East Asia to draw together under a single leader and to prepare for a hard fight."

Bose implemented his words by action. The Japanese held about 60,000 Indian prisoners of war and had been subjecting them to constant propaganda. The Japanese would be victorious. They would liberate India. The prisoners must compose the vanguard of an "army of liberation" to fight against the hated British and to bring ultimate peace and contentment to the suffering people of India. Bose announced the formation of such an army, setting his goal at 300,000 men, and started a vigorous drive to recruit Indians in Japanese-dominated territory..

Truthfully or not, Bose declared that he had agents at work in India. "It is no secret," he announced, "that many men from our army have been sent to work at home among the enemy." Simultaneously this advice was broadcast to India: "Brave Indians, you must undergo strenuous training, just as we are doing here, in preparation for the great day. Don't worry about arms and ammunition. They will come. Do all you can to form widespread secret organizations. Brace yourself for action and sacrifice."

From Tokyo Bose went to Singapore, where he set up permanent headquarters. The powerful Singapore radio —formerly British—was turned over to him for recruiting and the dissemination of nationalist propaganda. Its broadcasts appeal to every conceivable Indian prejudice, obviously seeking to intensify antagonism toward the British and to muster popular support for the "army of liberation." One of the mainsprings of this propaganda is constant praise of Mahatma Gandhi, who, it is stated explicitly, sides with Bose. "News" items such as this are frequent:

> Confidence that Mahatma Gandhi and a large number of his followers will extend their whole-hearted moral if not physical support once the Indian army successfully penetrates into India was expressed by Subhas Chandra Bose. . . . The fiery Indian national leader declared that

FAITH IN THE PEOPLE

Every new piece of information that comes from Italy underlines the role played by the people in its surrender. The pressure which they exercised on the Badoglio government to get their country out of the war never relaxed. Sometimes, as in Milan, their demonstrations were given definite political character by the Socialists, who demanded the abdication of the king. At other times they were not so articulate, but their clamor for peace was always inextricably linked with hatred of fascism and its leaders. In every occupied country in Europe the same feelings prevail. They prevail in Spain, and everywhere else where fascism has flourished. The popular will for freedom is indomitable after these infamous years of suppression and tyranny. That has been the reason for our unflinching faith in a victorious outcome of the war. No criticism we have made of the diplomacy of expediency or of the policy of appeasement has nullified our belief in the people of Europe. Against every stratagem, against every Machiavellianism, against every scheme to control their will by programs of relief or charity works the determination of the European masses to destroy fascism once and forever.

> although Mahatma Gandhi may not support fighting with arms because of his steadfast adherence to the principle of non-violence, it is certain that he will not oppose us.

Another appeal is to Indian women. "I wish," said Bose, "that there be an army of the heroic women of India, in which are included those intrepid women who would carry a sword in their hand like the Rani of Jhansi, and use it with the same daring and bravery with which the Rani of Jhansi used it in the first war for Indian independence in 1857." Bose succeeded in organizing a vanguard for his women's army in Singapore.

Hunger, which the British admit has reached near-famine proportions in India, provides Bose with one of his most effective weapons. "When we have annihilated the British in India," he promises, "famine will automatically disappear." He offered the Indian government, apparently with no strings attached, 100,000 tons of rice, to be delivered as the government saw fit. Day after day the offer was hammered home:

> Although it is four days now since Subhas Chandra Bose broadcast his offer to supply 100,000 tons of rice to the famine-stricken people of India, the British authorities have not yet made any reply. Meanwhile men, women, and children are dropping dead in the streets of Calcutta. The British authorities have only made arrangements to remove their corpses promptly.

As this poison flows into India, Bose energeticall enlists support for his movement throughout the Japanes Empire. He personally carried his recruiting drive int Burma and Thailand in a one-month tour, during whic he held long conversations with Ba Maw, Premier of th new "independent" Burma, and with Sonngram, the Tha Premier, who was celebrating the acquisition of the fou Shan states. When he returned to Singapore Bose announced that Burma and Thailand had assured him c their "full support" and that "concrete strategic plar for the offensive against the British in India" ha emerged from conversations with the Japanese commander-in-chief in Burma.

Shortly thereafter, in mid-August, Bose stated that hi army was ready. "I want to inform my comrades in th army and among the civil population that the India national army is now on the move," he asserted. "It is long way from Shonan [Singapore] to Delhi. Therefor we must now begin to pack. During the next two month a large portion of the army will be on the road to India.

There is no reason to doubt that Bose meant what h said. We don't know the size of his army, but Indian with whom I have spoken in this country believe it probable that he was able to recruit a large proportion of th prisoners held by the Japanese, and perhaps a few thousand more. Militarily Bose's army cannot compare wit the strength Britain would be able to muster in India The Indian villager, whose average daily income is estimated at something under two cents, would eagerl accept the ten dollars a month which the British arm would offer him. Bose and his Japanese mentors knov that their chances for enlisting support in India diminisl as the Allies' military power increases there.

The immediate purpose of Bose's army is in the mair political. On the Indian side of the Indo-Burmese borde lies Bengal, Bose's home and the seat of his politica prestige. Bose will make every effort to incite Indian to riot, assassination, and sabotage behind our lines Unquestionably he will try to smuggle them arms anc equipment. Chaos among the civilian population alon our lines of communication could seriously hamper, o perhaps even prevent, our projected offensive for th reopening of the Burma road.

But the United Nations have one secure political hol on the Indian people. Inevitably Bose has identified himself with the Axis, and particularly with Japan. He mus refer constantly to "our Japanese friends," who equippe his army and who have "given this opportunity to th Indians to win freedom for India with a minimum o sacrifice." China's resistance to Japanese aggression, however, has been an inspiration to the Indian nation, anc the mass of the people would be slow to assist China' enemy. Obviously Bose is deeply conscious of that fact He claims that Chiang Kai-shek is fundamentally sympathetic to Japan but has bowed to the coercion of Britai nd America. Chiang has been in India and has talked ith the Indian people. He is well liked. Bose's argu-ent, therefore, would prove effective only if Chiang ere to cease his resistance.

It is in that perspective that the danger of Bose's activi-es becomes clear. It is apparent that the Japanese believe hina will fall, perhaps within a year. Simultaneously ith Bose's political offensive in India, the Japanese have nducted an "appeasement" campaign in China, offering e same kind of independence they granted to Burma. Japan's sincerest hopes for China are for the self-verned development of China," says the Tokyo radio Cantonese. "Japan is the one nation about which China eed have no suspicion."

The success of this campaign will depend to a great xtent upon further deterioration in China's physical ell-being and in its relations with its allies. Failure to open the Burma road will reinforce Japan's efforts. nd if China should fall, India would not be far behind. hat is neither a far-fetched nor an alarmist statement. he sentiments of the Indian people are as little secret the desperate condition of China.

India's nationalist aspirations now have but one out-t, and that one is working for the Axis. Nehru, Bose's nly rival in political influence, is in jail and therefore lent. There is no equally powerful voice to tell Indians hat their national interests are bound up with the cause f the United Nations, and there is no political activity prove it to them.

BY ARGUS

THREE quotations, without comment: (1) The Westfälische Landeszeitung on August 14: "Some eople say defeat wouldn't be as bad as it is painted." his was followed by curses on such people. (2) The ustrian newspaper Heimatbote on August 21 published speech by the Gauleiter in which he said: "The opinion occasionally heard on remote farms that this war is ot the farmer's business." This was followed by curses n such "remote" farmers. (3) A Bavarian newspaper, e Augsburger Nationalzeitung, editorialized thus on ugust 21: "Some stupid people say, 'What do I care bout the war? I didn't want it. Let those fight who asked r it. What do I care—I have nothing to lose and noth-g to gain.' We must admit realistically that the longer e war lasts the more people waver and weaken." This as followed by curses on these "stupid people."

Two Swiss newspapers contain descriptions of Ger-any which may serve as a warning to this country. In e Basel Arbeiterzeitung of August 18 a Swiss traveler st back from Germany reported:

> As a result of the terrific shortage of goods black markets have sprung up which even the severest measures cannot restrict. Absurd prices are asked for goods that are in demand. For example, 150 to 300 marks [$60 to $80] for a pound of genuine coffee or tea; 200 to 400 marks [$80 to $160] for a pair of shoes, even for used ones; at Christmas and Easter 100 to 300 marks [$40 to $120] have been offered for fowl, and as much as 600 marks [$240] has been paid for a goose. A quart of olive oil brings 150 marks [$60], a bottle of wine 40 to 60 marks [$16 to $24]. People are not afraid of even the most enormous prices, for there is plenty of money but almost no way to spend it. That is why the black market has extended even to the lowest classes.

And the Berlin correspondent of the Corriere del Ticino, on August 10:

> It is amazing to see the amount of money spent in Germany and the open-handed way in which it is spent. Every chance to buy something must be seized. People rarely ask the price, and the sums they pay are astounding to one who, coming from Switzerland, has not lost all sense of the value of money.
> It must be noted that the strong desire to buy anything at any price is not limited to the wealthier classes. "The price doesn't matter" is a common expression, whether it is a question of theater tickets, cigarettes, liquor, clothes, rugs, or jewelry. . . . Such a tendency seems to be out of harmony with the unprecedented severity of the present war atmosphere. It can be explained only by the circumstances. There is hardly any possibility of converting the money people earn into real values. Consequently money has become superfluous and has lost its value.

In Germany cigarettes are now called "baby mattresses"—meaning that they are filled with something which, whatever it may be, is not tobacco. Even such cigarettes are greedily sought for—in vain. A Dortmund newspaper on July 31 described a scene in a railroad car. A "brute" had been "the victor in a terrible struggle for seats." He sprawled out on the seat, and put the finishing touch on his display of thoughtlessness by taking from his pocket "a package of twenty-five cigarettes, unmindful of the fact that in this province even a tobacco card with valid coupons is not sufficient to obtain cigarettes, which the majority of smokers must sadly give up for weeks."

The man who let his cigarettes be seen so openly, said the newspaper, was at best criminally tactless:

> Whoever recklessly shows large packages of cigarettes or full cigarette cases in public must understand that the suspicion will arise that he has got them by crooked means—that he has "good connections" or at least that he has something to barter. This annoys those who have no time to rush from store to store, or to stand in line, and are unable to obtain anything even with coupons.

BOOKS and the ARTS

MARSDEN HARTLEY

BY PAUL ROSENFELD

THAT "gaunt eagle from the hills of Maine," the painter Marsden Hartley—who died September 2, in his sixty-seventh year—was a prodigy. He was an extraordinary, an almost gigantic secondary artist. Had Hartley possessed a passion for perfection, for round, full inclusivity in his work, and somewhat more of the spirit of consecutiveness, he might easily have become a major one. For he was abundantly talented, this very modern American.

He was a man who intensely admired style in art and life. And rapturous or tragic emotion, fresh visual experience, the sense of novelty in connection with old and familiar as well as curious and new objects, always to some degree were present in him. He was a ceaselessly inventive artist, too, arriving constantly at fanciful new relations and unifications of the qualities and shapes, textures and colors of objects—the qualities and textures of coarse no less than of precious ones, of rope and vegetables no less than of Victorian draperies, the clouds of the desert, the Mont Sainte-Victoire of the south of France. He was decidedly versatile besides: painting on glass as well as on canvas; drawing with silver-point as well as with oils; and was a fine poet and writer of prose, to boot. A poet indeed in all his media, exquisitely he grasped the proud music of things, the glintings of the ideal which never were entirely hidden from him.

At first, during the years immediately following the introduction of his work in 1909 at 291 Fifth Avenue, his strangely impressive pictures exhibited the influences now of Segantini, now of the pointillists, now of Ryder. Yet from the first the expression of a new personality was obvious—the tragic expression of a freeman and a pictorial stylist. Before 1914, in association with the Blaue Reiter group—the Munich group of expressionists about Kandinsky and Marc—Hartley had developed an abstract prismatic idiom quite his own. And while he never entirely abandoned representation, and under the influence of a rediscovery of Cézanne in the later '20's fully went back to it, characteristically it was to a highly stylized, deliberately quaint, individual form of representation that he returned. The pity was that no idea, scene, or place ever was able lastingly to mobilize his soul and divert his persistent feeling of, for, and about himself and his artistic figure. Hartley at one period thought that Ryder had "fixed his imagination forever for him in the land of his birth." At another he fancied himself in the European tradition, and conceived the idea of continuing Cézanne's work. But his life really had no center outside himself.

For all Hartley's consequently frequent nonchalance of mood and flightiness in design and execution, no piece of work by him is bare of a peculiar elegance, while many a one is distinguished to a remarkable degree. Gracefulness and taste were deeply of the man's essence. We perceive this through his paintings' witness of his tactful sense of the pictorial medium's limitation. His pictures never rival sculpture. Hartley, indeed, was among the first Americans to seize the lesson of Cézanne and the later Renoir: the lesson that the painter is preconfined to the decoration of flat surfaces, merely may suggest the third dimension through subtleties of pigment but need not seek to deceive the eye. We see Hartley's tastefulness elsewhere; at well-nigh every point even in his most spectacularly flaunting canvases. Feelings of supereminence unfortunately were not uncommon in him. They were responsible for his predilection for grandiose rhythms and "stunning" or overwhelming symbols such as the plumage of the male bird, the masses of mountains and of mountainous surf. Well: some dandified twist of form, cool shapeliness of curve and elegance in color, keeps even the most parade-like of these almost diabolical expressions of his safely this side vulgarity and pompousness. Throughout, besides, one perceives that though he never was a warm colorist, Hartley possessed an unusual gift for refined and piquant pigmentation; an ability to extract dusky richness from dark and bitter tones; an unfailing awareness of the interest of handsome decoration.

Maine of all his haunts most consistently compelled his feeling and humanized his mood. Probably for that reason he returned to it so often in his final years. Contact with his natal soil doubtless also facilitated the expression of his life-long and mystical sense of death. Certainly, the units of the early dark series of "Deserted Farms" from Maine—well-nigh Wagnerian depictions of solitude, starvation, and New England's tragic sterility—rank high among his powerful if not his most accomplished paintings. So, too, do certain of his later, more accomplished visions of northern rock-and-stump-strewn pastures, and the "Dead Seagull," that noble companion of Ryder's piteously dead "Canary." Still it would be folly to identify his art's importance with the portion of it concerning Maine. Hartley's range in theme was vast. His output was enormous; during every period of his mercurial career he lavished intense and sumptuous paintings on the world; and a body of work more uniquely varied than his, and more fanciful, striking, and pungent, will not survive many of his American contemporaries in any of the fields of art.

Men and History

THE HERO IN HISTORY: A STUDY IN LIMITATION AND POSSIBILITY. By Sidney Hook. The John Day Company. $2.50.

THOUGH it is short, this latest work of Sidney Hook's is easily the richest and fullest of his historico-philosophical studies. It deals with the related questions, What is history, do we make it, and what share in the making can we assign to the outstanding individual popularly known as "the hero"?

Mr. Hook begins by describing and refuting the two tradinal hypotheses which state respectively that great men ne shape the history of nations and, contrariwise, that stract or general forces, spiritual or material, determine story, using men simply as figureheads, carried on the wing tide like surf riders, to their inescapable destination.

In the course of combating these two absolutisms Mr. Hook splays his usual dialectical skill. He frames alternatives, sentangles overlapping assumptions, reduces them to the surd, or cites concrete examples selected with great care d presented with even greater skill. His prose has always en lucid and sharp; it is now warmer and mellower through freer use of images and metaphors and the conversion of certain bitter humor into good-natured amusement.
roughout, the author dominates his material as one who s long since gathered and ordered it and who can now ke it up from any side and reach his center of vision by the ortest route. Mention casually Cleopatra's nose and he leads u to Roman history and the inadequacy of explaining esar's or Antony's policy by the Egyptian queen's beauty.
t the hounds of economic determinism on his trail and he uts them with a wonderfully condensed account of the ssibilities of Presidential action in the United States as ese possibilities existed in 1929 and 1933. But perhaps his nse of personality as revealed in and by history is at its ost delicate in the masterly chapter on the Russian Revolun of October, 1917, defining the role of Lenin as a maker events. Those forty pages should be read by every student history, lay and professional, for regardless of one's agree-nt or disagreement with its conclusion—which exemplifies
r. Hook's hypothesis—the essay is a model of the methodi-element in historical thinking.

But what is the Hook hypothesis? It is that the event-king man, as distinguished from the "eventful man" hose importance is that ascribed by Hobbes to the geese at saved the Roman Capitol—"because they were there, not ey"), the event-making man is by virtue of his qualities of dership a factor in the outcome of mighty movements.
ithout him, there was a real possibility of a different out-me. With him, there is not only the carrying out of wishes isting inchoate in the minds of many but the addition of sults due to his will alone. True, he works within limitans, but within them he has real power to create real nov-
y. He is not the "product" of a particular age or evolution any intelligible sense; for if he is considered simply as the m total of preexisting ideas and wills we are forgetting own will and unique abilities; and if he is considered as e upshot of six thousand years of recorded history, we know more about him than we did before, or than we know out any of his undistinguished contemporaries, of whom e assertion is equally true. The assigning of causes in history ns here into the usual snag of too much or too little, and mpels us either to salvage the four types of causes known the medieval logicians or to abandon the single "efficient" use which modern science has selected for its own purposes which may not be those of historiography.

Mr. Hook does not go so far as this; he takes cause in a mple common-sense fashion, and his speculation, which cludes some excellent and truly hypothetical "if history," designed by him to furnish wisdom for present application the modern citizen of a democracy. Is the hero compatible with the continuance of government based on freely given consent? The author hedges about his assent with strict conditions: a democracy must always be suspicious of the typical heroic qualities; it must keep ever in mind what a hero can and cannot do with social, political, and economic forces; and it must insist on a periodic review of the hero's doings, even while it recognizes their value in times of stress when swiftness of thought and action are indispensable. In other words, Mr. Hook preaches the wisdom of the Roman Republic with its "dictators" accountable to the Senate and, like the most famous of them, returnable to the plow. It is interesting to recall that with this symbol in mind the soldiers of the American Revolution formed the Society of the Cincinnati.

I should give unqualified approval to Mr. Hook's view of history if certain features of it—congenial to his mind and uncongenial to mine—did not stand in the way. They are matters of atmosphere and thus not without importance. For example, I admire his clarity, but I wonder whether for the sake of it he did not make one unjustified simplification. I mean his deciding the problem of democracy with sole reference to what might be called the top hero. He does say the democratic ideal should be to encourage leadership throughout the nation, but he repeats that heroic qualities should be viewed "with suspicion"; and he neglects to point out the necessity of heroic action in the doing of every normal day's work. If we are suspicious, we may overlook the function of the hero as the binding, organizing element in social life—the central nervous system for limbs endowed with merely muscular energy. It can be historically argued that lack of direction in the varied tasks of a society is one of the strongest urges to seeking an over-all hero who will magically supply the line of march. Being no less than Mr. Hook a pluralist, I am especially sensitive to the need for diversified centers of light and leading; for the breakdown of organic pluralism is a monistic block: you pass from the fruit growing on the branch to the rectangular brick of frozen pulp without shape or savor.

Then, again for simplicity, Mr. Hook excludes from action on the course of history genius in art, philosophy, or science, excepting of course those scientists whose work has been translated into technological change. At a later place in the book a single sentence modifies this exclusion but, to my mind, not enough; for the "forces" of history are composed of individual wills, each of which is directly or indirectly affected by ideas and art. Patriotism is such a "force," but its contents include poetry and song, great ideas and bad chromos. There need be no understanding of art as aesthetic objects; it is enough that there be associations of pride and attachment. The name of Shakespeare, who has always been much less read than praised, is as effective as the actual contents of Homer, who was learned by heart in ancient Greece: both derive their power from aesthetic greatness filtering through conscious critics and teachers of the young.

My last objection is to Mr. Hook's fondness for the label "scientific" for his work and that of other historians. With the best will in the world I cannot find that he means more by it than history based on honest and sound judgment, and especially free from the preconceptions of a rigid thesis. I should not dream of quarreling with the word, or with the references to the highly acceptable historical "laws" that h is careful to enunciate with quotation marks around "laws, if I did not believe that his striving after science led him t consider with too much seriousness and sympathy ideas lik those of F. A. Wood, who apparently tried to reach "empirica results" by giving "strong" and "weak" kings plus and minu marks and "correlating" their "strength" or "weakness" wit the qualities or defects of their periods. His work yielded number, though it really amounted to zero. Mr. Hook abl criticizes the method and the results both, but he is evidentl attracted by the idea of the method, which is to me the negation of the historical sense.

More deplorable still, as I think, is the fact that havin "empiricism" and "science" as watchwords, Mr. Hook i hampered in his reading of works such as Carlyle's "Heroe and the Heroic in History" and James's "Great Men and Thei Environment." His literalism makes him put these two contributions to his own problem farther away than they shoul be from his own solution; and one could say the same of hi detailed refutation of Pascal's famous remark about Cleopatra's nose. Pascal was not interested in the particular illustration; doubtless he knew less than Mr. Hook abou Roman history; but he was saying briefly and allusively part of what Mr. Hook has told us brilliantly and with th utmost degree of usefulness attainable by history and philosophy combined. THE newspaper correspondents in Cairo had been accustomed to British generals whose thinking, if any, wa in terms of defense—how to stop the Germans from conquering Egypt. The result was that the Eighth Army, a yea ago, had been all but destroyed, and Rommel's Afrika Korp was at the gates of Alexandria. Then General Montgomer came to the desert in August. He found British soldiers digging defensive ditches behind the Alamein line. "Stop it,' he ordered. "You'll never need them." Two months later on the morning of October 23, Montgomery called the correspondents into his tent and told them in a matter-of-fact wa that Rommel would be knocked out of Africa in a battl beginning that night. "We correspondents turned and looke at one another questioningly," says Richard McMillan. "W had never come across this type of unorthodox general before." They thought he was either a great general or madman.

Mr. McMillan was a correspondent for the United Press He went to the front in Albania when the Greeks were fighting the Italians, then returned to Greece with the pitifull small British Expeditionary Force and saw it being whippe by the Germans. All this is in "Mediterranean Assignment,' ich is a rather conglomerate journalistic history. Most of e book, and the best parts of it, deals with the North African sert campaigns: the first advance under Wavell, the siege Tobruk, the stand at El Alamein, and the final triumph der the military leader who was either a great general or madman.

In putting together the story of the desert war Mr. Mcillan contributes much that is new, notably in his account the fall of Tobruk in June of last year—a disaster which ocked the British public almost as much as Dunkirk. Previsly Tobruk had held out for eighteen months against erman besiegers, but the feat of keeping it supplied had st the British a ship a week in warships and merchantmen. hen the question of a second siege arose, the navy said it uld not guarantee to repeat the costly performance. Therere, the desert commanders decided to abandon the fortress d retire with their army and supplies intact to the Egyptian rder. About two days before the German attack, however, e polo-playing strategists of G. H. Q. in Cairo reversed the cision and ordered that Tobruk be held. It was too late. e British lost the fortress, 26,000 men, and huge quantities guns, tanks, and stores.

The Eighth Army's subsequent victory at El Alamein went ound the world by radio and lifted the spirits of American ldiers in the jungles of New Guinea, who were fighting e same war in a wholly different milieu. One of those mericans was E. J. Kahn, Jr., a Harvard graduate of 1937 o had worked on the staff of the New Yorker until his duction into the army. Most of his book, "G. I. Jungle," peared in that magazine originally; so the war through his es takes on a distinctly New Yorkerish flavor. He is litely amused by the quaint customs of Australia and the vealing costumes of the New Guinea natives. There is rtually no bloodshed.

"Out in the Boondocks" goes to the opposite extreme. ore blood is shed per paragraph than in any other war book far. Mr. Horan and Mr. Frank interviewed twenty-one en of the Marine Corps who fought on Guadalcanal, and ote their stories in the first person as though the marines emselves were telling them. The authors preserved the lloquialisms, the grammatical errors, and the cuss words. e effect is realistic, to say the least.

Nearly all of the twenty-one marines who thus tell their ories were wounded or shell-shocked. Sergeant Koziar came t of the battle with a little hole in the left side of his neck d a little hole in the right side; the bullet had missed an tery by a fraction of an inch and had removed both his nsils. A sniper's bullet skimmed along the wrist of Captain rgerson and removed the works of his watch. Private Hall, unded in the chest, played dead while Japanese kicked him d stole his cartridge belt. First Sergeant Harry D'Ortona, veteran marine, had instructed countless new recruits what do if a grenade landed beside them: pick it up and throw because you get away from it faster that way than by runng. A smoking grenade landed at his feet, exploded as he rew it, and peppered him with shrapnel; he lay on the ttlefield forty-eight hours, and survived. Private Harding und himself lying in a foxhole with a Japanese, and had strangle him by hand.

the battle climaxes on Guadalcanal. Of course there is much more to war than that, but nothing more important to the men in the front lines. It is all very well to read war books that emphasize the glamor, the adventure, the fascination of strategy and high politics; here in these pages one gets right out where the bullets are flying. It is not pleasant reading, but perhaps it is wholesome. MARCUS DUFFIELD

The "Tribune": First Phase

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE: ITS FIRST HUNDRED YEARS. Volume I, 1847-1865. By Philip Kinsley. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE Chicago Tribune will celebrate its hundredth anniversary in 1947. The present volume is the first of a series of what its author terms "historical sketches" of that newspaper, each of which will cover a period of years and which are scheduled for completion by the centennial year. Mr. Kinsley has been a top-flight Tribune correspondent for a long time. He writes clearly and for the most part well, and to that extent his book is a contribution to newspaper history. He lacks, however, the sense of a historical perspective. Apparently he has turned the pages of the Tribune and gleaned material for a running narrative, padding out his information with quotations from secondary sources which rarely shed further light on his subject. Chicago, which gave the Tribune its field for growth, is little more than a name throughout the volume. The news items, culled from issues of the Tribune, have a consistent air of irrelevance.

The essence of the old Tribune was its Republicanism. This volume, in its most important section, tells how Joseph Medill, the guiding spirit of the newspaper, and his associates contributed to making Lincoln Presidential timber. The Tribune's services during the Civil War were not unique. Like other Northern journals it thought the war would be short, approved McClellan and then abandoned him, demanded emancipation before the President was ready to proclaim it, and developed the general characteristics of "Radical Republicanism." But as a fugleman for Lincoln, the Tribune was far in advance of other and more distinguished Republican journals.

Medill, who was one of the founders of the Republican Party, did not come to the Tribune until 1855. He became acquainted with Lincoln that same year. From then on the newspaper printed Lincoln's speeches, familiarized its readers with his personality, and supported him against Douglas. But it was Medill's acute understanding of Lincoln's "availability" which finally determined his support of Lincoln for President rather than of the more radical Chase or Seward.

The President is said to have remarked, after his election, "Well, gentlemen, where do I come in? You seem to have given everything away." Time and again the Tribune affirmed its complete disinterestedness in his success; but Lincoln, when the issue of patronage came up, was forced to take into account the political deals which Medill and his coworkers had made. To say that the men who edited the Tribune were first and foremost business men not only describes them; it furnishes a key to the evolution of their newspaper.

Fiction in Review

A MAD, bad, and dangerous book, Allan Seager's "Equinox" (Simon and Schuster, $2.75) is fiction's most recent attempt to practice psychiatry without a license. Received as a conscientious study in incest, actually it develops from a not unpromising idea—and a very good first chapter—into what is little more than a penny thriller in morbid psychology, essentially on the intellectual level of a Karloff or Lorre movie. As a matter of fact, Mr. Seager's Verplanck—he is the psychiatric detonator, who makes the incest explode—is more than half our old friend the Mad Scientist of the comics and Hollywood. His lineage can also be traced back through Spandrell of "Point Counter Point" to des Esseintes of Huysmans's "A Rebours": start experimenting for experiment's sake and you seem to end up with a man-eating shark; and at least from the historical point of view there is a nice significance in Verplanck's concern with food, drink, and the appointments of his home.

It's a father and daughter in Mr. Seager's Oedipus situation—a young middle-aged newspaperman comes home from Europe on the eve of war and sets up house with his seventeen-year-old daughter. For the father this new home is a protection from the world; for the girl, fresh from a convent school, it is a romantic ideal of domestic love. But along come malicious friends who mouth the ugly word "sex," and father runs to Verplanck for advice and help. This is the moment Mr. Seager has been waiting for; indeed, throughout the book, you have the sense of the author lying in wait for his characters: it is a novel disconcertingly without feeling. Verplanck is an amateur psychiatrist who devotes his life to destroying people by means of his "scientific" understanding of them; he keeps elaborate case records on his friends; he marries a woman in order to give her a neurosis which he will then be able to follow from scratch—all very serious and sinister and fantastic. Well, Verplanck too says sex, with the full weight of his psychiatric authority, and the girl commits suicide.

I call "Equinox" not only mad and bad but dangerous—and I mean this quite simply and literally. The danger lies, obviously, in the representation of Verplanck's scientific authority. Mr. Seager is careful to call him an amateur, but Verplanck is also an M.D. and has been psychoanalyzed; his analyst is even mentioned by actual name, Stekel. Also, psychiatry as practiced by Verplanck is at no point contrasted to the ethical practice of psychiatry. Psychiatry being, to the popular imagination, the most suspect of the sciences, this propagation in fiction of one author's own dark fancies is socially irresponsible.

Two years ago Robert Paul Smith published his first novel, "So It Doesn't Whistle." Now his second novel, "The Journey" (Holt, $2), has appeared, and like its predecessor it is full of mis- or undirected talent, and cleverness in a vacuum. The story of a young man named Paul Marrane who throws up his job in an advertising agency to seek his soul in Mexico, "The Journey" is not the kind of finished job, like "Equinox," to dismiss or disdain, but a novel to make one sternly pedagogic with its author. For Mr. Smith is still quite a young man, and he has been praised for the wrong things in his earlier work: for instance, his brittle modernity is something o be guarded against, not fostered, and on the other hand his real ability lies in his power to see and describe; then, his major faults are the faults of his generation, their prevalence in large part the responsibility of the book reviewers; last and not least in importance, Mr. Smith's seriousness, the impression he makes of being committed to writing and working at it, demands an equal seriousness from his critics: he should not be patronized with easy praise.

The author of "The Journey," then, should be told that although the theme of the artist in search of his soul is still, and until the day of the corporate man always will be, a fine theme for fiction, it is a theme that lends itself merely to self-exhibition unless the artist-hero is shown as a person of stature and his soul as worth saving. Paul Marrane talks about the arts constantly, but this makes him neither a convincing artist nor an interesting human being. His talk is "wise" talk; he is in on painting, Mozart, García Lorca, and hot jazz, just as he is in on sex. But looked at seriously, this being half in possession of, instead of being possessed by, either one's culture or one's body is a stage of development or material for satire: it is not desirable by mature standards. If the world is full of random knowingness passing itself off as the real thing, the author who writes about it without making clear his own maturity inevitably reduces his own importance.

Again, nothing much happens to Paul on his voyage of salvation. He drives his car fast, he sleeps with a waitress, he drinks too much, he talks with a steward. But it should be pointed out to Mr. Smith that this refusal to tell a story is the dead-end of fiction. Joyce, Proust, Hemingway, whoever are Mr. Smith's models, all were careful to tell a story. If a writer has nothing to say except what he feels, he is a poet—provided, of course, that he feels with poetic intensity—but for the writer of fiction to look at the world without its drama is to see the world peopled only by himself.

Finally, Paul Marrane, or his author, turns out to be a nice person who went to Mexico and enjoyed what he saw. Stripped of its literary lardings, in other words, what remains from "The Journey," and its best part, is a travel diary, and although the ability to see and record what you see may not be enough to make a novelist, it is a far sounder literary taking-off place than the desire to make literature. Mr. Smith doesn't trust this talent; he fancies it up, giving to performance the energies that might better be devoted to such modest necessities of fiction as character and plot.

MAN

Now, when victory and plans for the peace are a vital issue, Henry A. Wallace's ideas are the concern of all intelligent people. They're bound to influence the shape of things to come, just as his electrifying speeches have guided the thoughts of millions. What can we learn from Russia? How shall we handle the national debt? What kind of post-war world organization shall we have? How can we achieve freedom from want? This book, a collection of the most significant recent Wallace statements, discusses these and other pressing problems, giving the straight answers of a public man who is not afraid to speak his mind. *Paper-bound 75c. IN BRIEF

CLIMATES OF TRAGEDY. By William Van O'Connor. Louisiana State University Press. $1.75.

This is a compact, scholarly, and thoughtful study of the essence of tragedy. Compared with the tragedy of the great age of Greece and with Shakespeare, the tragedy of our own stage is seen as falling short of the true standard. Briefly, an event is not tragic simply because it is terrible or causes suffering. It is tragic in the poetic sense only if it befalls the principal character as a consequence of his own evildoing, and if he behaves with dignity under misfortune. The man who redeems himself by dying is not a tragic figure.

THE INTERPRETATION OF HISTORY. Edited with an Introduction by Joseph R. Strayer. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

In this stimulating short volume the significance and value of history are discussed from various aspects by several first-class students of the subject. Jacques Barzun, on History, Popular and Unpopular, is perhaps the most entertaining, but all are readable and thought-provoking—Hajo Holborn on The Science of History; Herbert Heaton's warning against a one-sided interpretation, The Economic Impact on History; Biography and History, by Dumas Malone; and George La Piana on the danger of approaching history with preconceived beliefs, Theology and History.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT AND THE RISE OF THE MODERN NAVY. By Gordon Carpenter O'Gara. Princeton University Press. $1.50.

One of our greatest national blind spots has been neglect of the study of war. It is therefore much to the credit of Princeton University that its scholars have taken the lead in producing a series of excellent volumes based on exhaustive research in military and naval affairs. While less ambitious than some of its predecessors, "Theodore Roosevelt and the Rise of the Modern Navy" is a worthy member of a series which includes works by Professor Brodie and the Sprouts. In bringing Theodore Roosevelt to the helm of affairs in the early 1900's fate assigned him one of the most revolutionary eras in naval history. With significant changes of every sort impending, Roosevelt found the American navy guilty of sins of commission and omission of every kind and so deeply mired in conservatism that it had no idea of its own backwardness. How unsatisfactory conditions in organization, ship construction, target practice, tactics, fundamental strategy, and advancement of officers were improved is the main theme of Mr. O'Gara's book. Despite occasional failures the results were impressive, and the President is revealed as a military statesman of the first rank. While this volume contains little new material, it is nevertheless a well-written study of an important period in our naval history.

THE ANATOMY OF NONSENSE. By Yvor Winters. New Directions. $3.

Mr. Yvor Winters, as he states with pride, is reactionary. He also starts from premises so far removed from those of most educated moderns that his scale of values can be called esoteric. But he is a learned man and an interesting writer, and one can be grateful for his brilliant exposure of the confusion of Henry Adams and T. S. Eliot; the latter is one of the most confused minds and baffling critics now adorning literature. In the other two essays in this book—on Wallace Stevens and John Crowe Ransom—Mr. Winters illustrates his own faults, which are, indeed, fundamental.

THE JAPANESE IN SOUTH AMERICA. An Introductory Survey With Special Reference to Peru. By J. F. Normano and Antonello Gerbi. The John Day Company. $1.75.

This brief handbook, issued under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations and the Latin American Economic Institute, makes readily accessible the basic facts that are prerequisite to a discussion of the significance of the striking Japanese infiltration into some countries of South America. Its statements are well documented.

NEW POEMS. Dylan Thomas. New Directions. $1.

Dylan Thomas is a young English poet whose work produced excited cries from young American poets when "The World I Breathe" was published here about three years ago. Sixteen poems he has written since have now been issued by New Directions under the title "New Poems." It is doubtful whether the original excitement that Thomas created will be revived by these further examples of his work. The jacket states modestly that in these poems Thomas "seems to be progressing toward greater logical lucidity"; that may be so, but most reader will still find him more or less opaque The longest poem in the little volum is the Ballad of the Long-Legged Bait an alliterative piece which, astonishingl enough for the work of a member o the avant-garde of English letters, stem straight from Swinburne. As might b suspected, it does not come off quite s well as the ballads of Mr. S.

THE MIDDLE EAST. By Eliahu Ben Horin. W. W. Norton and Company $3.

A lucid description of the breakdow of the Turkish Empire leads into a unusually good survey of Middle Easter political problems. A Zionist, inclinin toward Max Nordau's intransigenc rather than toward Dr. Weizmann' "reasonableness," the author presents critical but not intransigent account no only of British misconduct in Palestin but of European imperialism in general Pan-Arabism and Pan-Islamism receiv thorough examination and are discounted as dangers. Liberals who ar sympathetic to Zionism but naturall suspicious of enforced migration—suc as the author proposes for the Arabs o Palestine and Transjordania—migh have liked a more inclusive survey o Zionist views concerning the problem of settlement. With this and the adde reservation that greater attention migh have been paid to economic matter Mr. Ben-Horin's lively book deserve recommendation as a primer of Nea Eastern problems.

THE PROBLEM OF INDIA. By R Palme Dutt. International Publishers $2.

To the non-Communist advocate of Indian freedom the chief value of thi book will lie in its excellent historica analyses. These are Marxist in method but even to the reader who rejects th author's philosophy the material presented, not easily to be found elsewhere will be of real value. The rapid surve of economic conditions, the account o the origin of private property in land—not an indigenous feature of Indian life—and the agrarian crisis, the outline o the structure of Indian society, and th critique of British imperialism are al of them good and some of them more than good. Less reliable, though alway suggestive, are the sections on the Indian national movement and the role o Congress. To the average liberal reade the author's criticism of the Congres resolution on non-cooperation, agreeabl mperate in tone, will seem inconsistent. he book concludes with a brief and npersuasive outline of present Commu- ist policy.

MUSIC

IT IS not true that when a member of a symphony orchestra participates a performance which is recorded he making a substitute for his services at will make them superfluous. It is ot true that records—whether played the home or from a broadcasting udio—have reduced the number of mphony orchestras or their concerts. n the contrary, not only has recording ut money into the pocket of the symhony orchestra player, but royalties rom the records have helped the orchesas to make up their deficits, and there reason to believe that the records have elped to create an interest in the music hich has led people to the concert hall nd opera house. So with the player in celebrated jazz band: when he particiates in a performance that is recorded e is not throwing himself out of work; n the contrary, the records he makes—layed in the home and in juke-boxes —contribute enormously to building up e popularity of his band that means ngagements for living performances nd for recording.

What is true is that by making recrds the symphony orchestra or jazz and musician has contributed to throwg somebody else out of work. Some f the small broadcasting stations which ow broadcast records of great symhony orchestras and name bands, some f the restaurants which use Muzak, ome of the large dance places which se multi-speakered juke-boxes formerly mployed small groups of living musiians; and these men have lost their obs. The technological unemployment at Mr. Petrillo complains of is, then, fact.

If it is a fact he is right in contending at something should be done about it; nd one of the things he wants is remployment. Now obviously if the small roadcasting stations were compelled to op broadcasting records of symphony rchestras and name bands they would ot engage living symphony orchestras nd name bands. The most that some of em could hire is a few players; and ome could not afford even that. Again, ome of the restaurants and dance places hich use Muzak and juke-boxes could ehire the small groups they employed ormerly; but smaller places like diners and lunchrooms and ice cream parlors, if deprived of juke-boxes, would go back to no music at all. In this connection one must consider, however, that the public which has been hearing Beethoven played by great symphony orchestras or has been dancing to popular songs played by name bands may not want to listen to Liszt's "Liebestraum" played by a five-man group or dance to popular songs played by local jazz bands; so that even if Mr. Petrillo is able to compel the reemployment of a number of living musicians, some of them may be hired merely to "stand by" without playing—which is as degrading and vicious when done by musicians as it is when done by workers in other unions.

Reemployment can take care of only part of the technologically unemployed; and for the rest Mr. Petrillo asked the industry for financial compensation. The industry's spokesmen answered with objections to his estimate of the musicians thrown out of work, to the amount of compensation he had asked, to the method by which the money he had demanded would be controlled and administered; and some of the objections seemed justified. But the interesting thing is that the industry's spokesmen did not make any proposal for a joint inquiry for the purpose of discovering how much unemployment had resulted from the use of records and deciding what should be done about it—as they would have done if they had had any feeling of social responsibility. This is interesting because they accused Mr. Petrillo of ruthless disregard of the public interest, when they themselves did not have the regard for the public interest that would have led them to recognize an obligation on the part of their industry to do something about the technological unemployment it had caused.

Sir Thomas Beecham's suggestion that the compensation come out of fees paid for the use of the records is better than Mr. Petrillo's remedies in all ways —one of them being the fact that the basis of the compensation is not an obligation depending on corporation executives' feeling of social responsibility, but the much stronger legal obligation to pay for what one uses. The companies which take advantage of the present defect in the copyright law to pirate recorded performance should be compelled by a correction of the defect to pay for their use of the records; when they have paid there will be additional money in the hands of the musicians who made the records that have thrown other musicians out of work; and some of this money will go, as it should, to compensate these others.

Another advantage of Sir Thomas's remedy is that it is not related to the condition it would remedy. When the industry was asked to pay compensation for the technological unemployment it had caused, it had a right to raise questions about the men who were to be compensated, and to object to giving the union complete control of the money. But the industry cannot refuse to pay for its use of records on the ground that afterwards the money will be controlled by the union and may be given to members of the union who really are not entitled to it. What becomes of the money the musicians will receive for the use of the records will be none of the industry's business, and will not affect its obligation to pay the money for the use; if the union mishandles the money, that—like other intra-union abuses—will be for the membership of the union to deal with. And if the industry expresses concern over such possible mishandling, that will be a smoke-screen to cover its real objective, which will be to continue not to pay for what it uses; just as its loud concern over the abuse of the composer by ASCAP, with which it justified the setting-up of its own composers' association BMI, was a smoke-screen for its desire to pay less for the music it used.
